INFORMATION TO USERS

This manuscript has been reproduced from the microfilm master. UMI films the text directly from the original or copy submitted. Thus, some thesis and dissertation copies are in typewriter face, while others may be from any type of computer printer.

The quality of this reproduction is dependent upon the quality of the copy submitted. Broken or indistinct print, colored or poor quality illustrations and photographs, print bleedthrough, substandard margins, and improper alignment can adversely affect reproduction.

In the unlikely event that the author did not send UMI a complete manuscript and there are missing pages, these will be noted. Also, if unauthorized copyright material had to be removed, a note will indicate the deletion.

Oversize materials (e.g., maps, drawings, charts) are reproduced by sectioning the original, beginning at the upper left-hand corner and continuing from left to right in equal sections with small overlaps. Each original is also photographed in one exposure and is included in reduced form at the back of the book.

Photographs included in the original manuscript have been reproduced xerographically in this copy. Higher quality 6" x 9" black and white photographic prints are available for any photographs or illustrations appearing in this copy for an additional charge. Contact UMI directly to order.

UMI

University Microfilms International
400 North First Street
Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1346 USA
1-800-521-3600

University Microfilms International
400 North First Street
Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1346 USA
1-800-521-3600
The Red Jews: Apocalypticism and antisemitism in medieval and early modern Germany

Gow, Andrew Colin, Ph.D.
The University of Arizona, 1993
THE RED JEWS:
APOCALYPTICISM AND ANTISEMITISM IN MEDIEVAL AND EARLY MODERN GERMANY

by Andrew Colin Gow

A Dissertation Submitted to the Faculty of the DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY
In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements
For the Degree of DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY
In the Graduate College
THE UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA

1993
The University of Arizona
Graduate College

As members of the Final Examination Committee, we certify that we have read the dissertation prepared by Andrew John Jow entitled The Red Jews: Apocalypticism and Antisemitism in Medieval and Early Modern Germany and recommend that it be accepted as fulfilling the dissertation requirement for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Date: March 1993

Date: ______________

Date: ______________

Date: ______________

Date: ______________

Final approval and acceptance of this dissertation is contingent upon the candidate's submission of the final copy of the dissertation to the Graduate College.

I hereby certify that I have read this dissertation prepared under my direction and recommend that it be accepted as fulfilling the dissertation requirement.

Dissertation Director

Date: ______________
STATEMENT BY AUTHOR

This dissertation has been submitted in partial fulfillment of requirements for an advanced degree at The University of Arizona and is deposited in the University Library to be made available to borrowers under rules of the Library.

Brief quotations from this thesis are allowable without special permission, provided that accurate acknowledgement of source is made. Requests for permission for extended quotation from or reproduction of this manuscript in whole or in part may be granted by the head of the major department or the Dean of the Graduate College when in his or her judgment the proposed use of the material is in the interests of scholarship. In all other instances, however, permission must be obtained from the author.

SIGNED: ___________________
I would like to acknowledge the support of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, which granted me a Doctoral Fellowship from 1989 to 1993; of the Dr. Günther Findel-Stiftung zur Förderung der Wissenschaften e.V. for a Dissertation Research Fellowship; of the Herzog August Bibliothek (Wolfenbüttel, Federal Republic of Germany); and of the Graduate College in the University of Arizona for a travel Grant from the Graduate Student Research Fund.

The support of Ms. Luise Betterton, Administrative Assistant, and of my colleagues in the Division for Late Medieval and Reformation Studies of the Department of History at the University of Arizona has been essential to the completion of this study.

This dissertation benefitted from the early training provided by Professors Jutta and Robert Goheen (Carleton University, Ottawa), the stellar example of Professor Gordon Griffiths (University of Washington), the collegial assistance at crucial junctures of Professor Winfried Frey (Frankfurt a/M), the tireless reading and sound advice of Professors Donald Weinstein and Alan Bernstein (University of Arizona), and, above all, the interest, enthusiasm and committed backing of my advisor, Professor Heiko A. Oberman.
DEDICATION

For Josh and Anne
TABLE OF CONTENTS

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.................................................. 3

ABSTRACT............................................................................. 9

I. INTRODUCTION.............................................................. 10
   1. Prospectus............................................................. 10
   2. Scholarship........................................................... 21
   3. Historiographical Considerations................................ 29

II. APOCALYPTICISM AND MESSIANISM: CHRISTIAN AND JEWISH PERSPECTIVES ON THE END IN LATE ANTIQUITY AND THE MIDDLE AGES.......................... 47
    1. The 'Unclean' Peoples and Gog and Magog................. 48
    2. The Ten Tribes.................................................... 53
    3. The Later Middle Ages............................................ 66

III. ANTISEMITISM AND APOCALYPTICISM
    IN THE MIDDLE AGES................................................... 71
    1. Comestor's Conflation:
       Gog and Magog Meet the Ten Tribes........................... 71
    2. Jewish Cannibalism.
       Another Hostile Identification.................................. 91
    3. 'Variants and Variety.
       The Ten Tribes in Europe........................................ 99

IV. THE RED JEWS IN THEIR 'NATIVE HABITAT'....................... 118
   1. The Middle Ages See Red:
      The Moral View................................................... 120
   2. The Textual Tradition............................................. 126
   3. The Audience: Text and Context................................ 158

V. THE MEDIEVAL ANTICHRIST
    AND HIS JEWISH HENCHMEN........................................... 164
   1. The Antichrist: What or Who..................................... 164
   2. An Unusual Birth:
      Antichrist in Antiquity.......................................... 168
   3. Holy and Roman: Ancient Ideas Concerning Antichrist in the Early Middle Ages............................................... 176
   4. The Allegorical Antichrist:
      German Symbolism................................................ 178
   5. The Personal Antichrist:
      Christian Visions................................................. 182
   5. The German Antichrist: Vernacular and Latin Sources from the Holy Roman Empire................................. 199
LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

FIGURE 1, Ebstorf World Map (1235). Gog and Magog eating human flesh and drinking human blood................................. 504

FIGURE 2, Sächsische Weltchronik (Saxon Chronicle): the ‘enclosed Jews’.......................... 505

FIGURE 3, Historiated Bible I: the ‘enclosed Jews’..... 506

FIGURE 4, Pseudo-Methodius (Basel, 1498)
  a) Alexander prays, kneeling, asking God to enclose Gog and Magog in the Caspian Mountains.................... 507
  b) Gog and Magog break out of the Caspian Mountains at the end of time................................. 508

FIGURE 5, The Red Jews in the Antichrist book
  a) An apostle of the Antichrist preaches to the Red Jews and the Queen of the Amazons.................... 509
  b) The Red Jews and the Queen of the Amazons march to Jerusalem............ 510

FIGURE 6, "Von ainer grosse meng // unnd gewalt der Juden....................... 511
ABSTRACT

The Red Jews are a legendary people; this is their history. From the late thirteenth to the late sixteenth century, vernacular German texts depicted the Red Jews, a conflation of the Biblical ten lost tribes of Israel and Gog and Magog, as a savage and unnaturally foul nation, who are enclosed in the 'Caspian Mountains', where they had been walled up by Alexander the Great. At the end of time, they will break out and serve the Antichrist, causing great destruction and suffering in the world. The hostile identification (c. 1165) of Jews with the apocalyptic destroyers of Ezekiel 38-39 and Revelation 20 expresses a new and virulent antisemitism that was integrated into the powerful apocalyptic traditions of Christianity.

None of the few scholars who have noticed the Red Jews in medieval and early modern vernacular texts has sought out, collected and examined the complete body of medieval and early-modern sources that feature the Red Jews. This study provides a long-term analysis of the intimate connections between antisemitism and apocalypticism via a forgotten and submerged piece of German 'medievalia', the Red Jews.

The legend gradually dissipated. Until the beginning of the seventeenth century it was a medieval lens through which Germans saw events relating to the Turkish threat in the East; after that time, the Red Jews disappeared from European texts.
I: INTRODUCTION

"Un document est un témoin; comme la plupart des témoins, il ne parle guère que lorsqu'on l'interroge."1 -- Marc Bloch

1. Prospectus

The Last Things have occupied Christian thinkers and believers at least since the composition of the book of Revelation, a work closely related to the Jewish apocalyptic tradition. A associated concern to Christians since the separation of the early Christian communities from their Jewish roots is the final conversion of the Jews, prophesied in the Christian Scriptures and eagerly awaited as a necessary part of the final drama that would free the suffering, confessing Christians from the bonds of a sinful world. The Revelation of St. John and other biblical, apocryphal and classical material -- including the prophecies of the Tiburtine Sibyl -- played a major role in the constitution of Christian apocalyptic thought in late antiquity. One of the most popular apocalyptic tales in medieval Europe, the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius, was the main vehicle (outside the Bible) for eschatological themes, though it augmented and distorted them in ways that would come. The Alexander novel of late antiquity was a powerful literary parallel that continued to exert a powerful influence on medieval apocalyptic.

---

Throughout the Middle Ages and on through the Reformation, apocalyptic expectations gripped all social and intellectual groups; they were spread and confirmed not only in Latin works, but also in vernacular literature. Interwoven with the ubiquitous belief in a final Tribulation was the

1. As František Graus argues in his book Pest-Geißler-Judenmorde. Das 14. Jahrhundert als Krisenzeit (Göttingen, 1987). Although the plague of the mid-fourteenth century did not produce apocalyptic expectations any stronger than those common to the so-called high and later middle ages, the fourteenth century was to be a nothbed of apocalyptic angst: "Wohl in keinem Jahrhundert des Hoch- und Spätmittelalters mangelt es an Stimmen, die das nahende Weltende, die drohende Nähe des Jüngsten Gerichts verkündeten. In den Fußstapfen St. Augustins sahen sich immer wieder Generationen am Ende der Tage angelangt, die zwangsläufige Folge war, daß sich eschatologische Erwähnungen zuweilen zu reinen Topoi wandelten. Sie waren jedoch allgegenwärtig, nicht auf Kreise verspennener Außenseiter beschränkt..." (70-71).
notion that the Jews were to play an important role in the last events. This would be conversion, according to the traditional and 'friendlier' Joachite view.

As medieval antisemitism moved beyond occasional pogroms toward a codified and legalistic system of disadvantages and restrictions, based in part on the ineffectual and patchy imperial protection owed to the Jews as imperial serfs, the role to be played by the Jews at the end of time grew correspondingly more sinister. Thus, the hostile vision of the Jews that governed the medieval evolution of the role Christians believed Jews would play at the End was grounded not primarily in anti-Judaism, that is, opposition to Jewish religious tenets and doctrines, but in the antisemitic creation, out of ancient legends and prophecies, Scriptural passages interpreted to fit these stories, and half-understood snippets of Jewish Messianic lore, of a system of belief and prophecy that cast the Jews as apocalyptic destroyers. This

'. The literature devoted to antisemitism, anti-Judaism and the question of which term applies to which manifestations of hatred for the Jews and things Jewish is truly immense. One of the only commentators on such phenomena in pre-modern and early modern times to approach the subject with clarity and logical order has been Gavin Langmuir. In a series of articles published since the late 1960s and collected, with significant new chapters, in his book Toward a Definition of Antisemitism (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990), Langmuir has dealt with the social, economic, religious and psychological study demonstrates that antisemitism and apocalypticism are so inextricably intertwined in medieval Europe that they must be studied together in order to form a coherent and accurate picture of both phenomena. This is particularly so when these seemingly disparate phenomena merge thematically to form one overarching system of prophetic, exegetical and 'historical' (heilsgeschichtlich) interpretation -- in theological, literary and 'everyday' texts.

Chapters II and III concentrate on the traditions that prepared and produced the characteristically German apocalyptic and antisemitic legend of the Red Jews. This legend represents the most virulent form of antisemitic apocalypticism, in which dread produces loathing. The result is a dehumanizing, even racist vision of the 'Jewish factors involved in Christian hostility toward Jews from antiquity to the present. His view is that "until about the year 1000, hostility toward Jews was purely anti-Judaic and generally insignificant", but after 1100, in the more self-consciously Christian societies of western Europe, Jews came to be excluded systematically from Christian life (303-304). The thirteenth century saw the rise of antisemitic accusations (the blood libel, ritual cannibalism, Host desecration) so unfounded in observable reality that Langmuir suggests a new term to describe these products of the Christian imagination: 'chimeria', from the Greek chimera (esp. 328-350). Although he argues convincingly that the current use of the term antisemitism is misleading and imprecise, due above all to its racist overtones and pseudo-scientific baggage, he continues to use the term as a catch-all to describe phenomena that target Jews not simply as one minority among others, in classic xenophobic fashion, but as a particular menace and symbol of evil: phenomena that focus on Jews a complex of irrational fantasies ('chimeria') used to justify their murder, even their complete eradication (351-352).

destroyers'. The roots of this legend are to be found in classical and biblical antiquity; namely 1) the story of the monstrously foul 'unclean nations' enclosed by Alexander the Great, to protect civilization, behind a wall in a mountain range, or between two mountains, in the far north-east (seen from the Mediterranean); 2) the legend of Gog and Magog, the biblical destroyers of the Apocalypse (Ezekiel 38-39, interpreted in Rev. 20), who will destroy the world at the end of time; and 3) the legend of the ten 'lost' northern tribes of Israel (2 Kings 17; 4 Ezra [Esdrēs] 13), long believed by many Jews (and later by Christians) to be a huge army waiting somewhere in the east, in reserve, against the day when God would send them out to wreak havoc on a sinful world.

My first tasks are a) to trace the sources of these legends and their dissemination through the western (Christian) tradition, and b) to analyze the powerful conglomerate tale that emerged in the later 12th century from a conflation of these three traditions. The imaginary people thus constructed as 'unclean Jewish destroyers of Christianity' was to have a long history in European letters, and would take on a peculiar coloring in German-language texts both literary and religious. The name Red Jews, attached to the horrific 'enclosed Jews' in the later thirteenth century, was first used in courtly literature, but soon passed into less high-flown genres where it came to strike a note of sheer terror as the Christian idea of Jewish participation in the Last Things turned sinister' and apocalyptic angst mingled with antisemitic animus.'

The legend of the Red Jews occurs only in German texts.'

All the evidence I have found suggests that the Red Jews were Winfried Frey has sketched in broad terms the change from the 12th to the 16th century in Christian expectations concerning the role of the Jews at the end of time: in the Tegernsee 'Ludus de Antichristo' of the 12th C., the Jews are taken in by the Antichrist only after he subdues all the other peoples of the earth; in the sermons of Berthold of Regensburg, the Jews 'left over' after the reign and destruction of the Antichrist will convert -- i.e., the Jews are not the servants of the Antichrist from the beginning.

However, in the Lucerne Passion Play of 1549, the Jews are the first and most important servants of the Antichrist; see "Gottesmörder und Menschenfeinde. Zum Judenbild in der deutschen Literatur des Mittelalters", in: Die Juden in ihrer mittelalterlichen Umwelt, ed. Alfred Ebenbauer and Klaus
This fleeting sample points to a dramatic and fateful development which will be treated in detail in the appropriate context. Frey jumps to the mid-sixteenth century Antichrist play of Lucerne (1549) as the terminus ad quem, but as he suggests, the change has already occurred by the fifteenth century; cf. the 1450 chiroxylographic Antichrist in chapters IV and V.

For a discussion of the frightening groundswell, in the later Middle Ages, of violent European antisemitism, see Heiko A. Oberman, "The Stubborn Jews. Timing the Escalation of Antisemitism in Late Medieval Europe", in: Leo Baeck Yearbook 34 (1989), xi-xxv.

The three exceptions prove the rule: two are in late Latin texts composed by German speakers; one is in the Middle Swedish Konung Alexander, a translation from the Latin Alexander novel that borrows the term from the German tradition.
known only in the German-speaking world, and remained an integral part of the German world-view accessible to us through vernacular texts until the end of the sixteenth century. The existence of a specific term probably helped preserve this medieval legend into the 'modern' era.

On the basis of the background established in chapters II and III, chapters IV to VI of this study will analyze the role of the Red Jews in late medieval and Reformation-era popular apocalyptic belief 1) as it articulated powerful and pervasive antisemitic prejudice and beliefs in the German-speaking lands; 2) as it related to the immensely popular and influential legend of the Antichrist; and 3) as it functioned in a series of hitherto overlooked sixteenth-century German pamphlets that report on the Turks and their activities in the east.

In the second half of the fifteenth and first decades of the sixteenth century, the legend of the Red Jews participated in an intense burst of apocalyptic expectation. Christians and Jews paid anguished attention to possible signs that the Last Days were at hand. The expulsion of the Jews from Spain and Messianic hopes among the Jews left in the Iberian peninsula

---

"I include under the term "German-speaking" the Low Countries, at least in the Middle Ages, when linguistic differences were neither so great nor so sharply defined."
and among those in Italy and Germany contributed to renewed Jewish hopes for the imminent arrival of the Messiah -- regarded by many Christians as the Antichrist. Among Christians, all levels of society were affected. The belief that Jews, especially 'imaginary', or rather, fictitious Jews -- the real ones were being driven out of the German towns and territories -- were to be responsible for the coming disaster was central to popular attitudes. The medieval legend of the Red Jews was very much alive in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Its popularity is documented in the Antichrist books of the fifteenth century. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, it must still have been well known, because the learned commentators Victor von Carben (1508) and Johannes Agricola (1528) take the trouble to denounce the story of the Red Jews among Jews and Christians, respectively, as a foolish tale. In 1530, both Luther and Anthonius Margaritha mention and dismiss as a fable the legend of the Red Jews -- whether in its traditional Christian form, or, as with Victor and

2. I.e., the Red Jews = Gog and Magog = the ten tribes of Israel = the peoples enclosed by Alexander the Great.
Margaritha, understood as the Ten Tribes only. These sources of information are largely 'negative', just as medieval penitentials provide information e negotio about popular 'superstitions' and beliefs. Yet there is also positive evidence that this legend persisted well into the Reformation era. Pamphlets dated 1523, 1562 and 1596 all warn that the Red Jews are on the march toward Jerusalem -- yet the context of each pamphlet is different, and the uses to which the Red Jews are put change accordingly over the course of the century. All these pamphlets were printed in numerous editions; all relate to threatened or actual wars involving the Ottoman Empire. The military advances of the Turks caused considerable terror throughout the sixteenth century, even though political leaders (e.g., Charles V) were slow to take the Turkish threat seriously. Not so Luther, and not so a large portion of the

---

1. To these converted Jews, the "Red Jews" were the Ten Tribes, pure and simple: they were not aware of, or at least made no mention of the components that characterized the 'Red Jews' in the Christian tradition, namely, their identity with Gog and Magog and the idea that they had been enclosed by Alexander the Great. The Jewish tradition lacked these elements, following Biblical passages that depict the Ten Tribes as having been carried off to the east by the Assyrian king Salmanassar, then enclosed by divine providence beyond a river that could not be crossed, except on the Sabbath -- hence Sabbath or Sambation -- when orthodox Jews do not undertake journeys (in this case: cross rivers). God would stop the flow when it was time for the Ten Tribes to issue forth into the world again, at the advent of the Messiah. Victor and Antonius may have influenced Christian understanding of the term 'Red Jews', especially in the 1523 pamphlet. This does not apply to the case of Agricola, Luther or the later sixteenth-century pamphlets (see ch. 7I).
German-speaking population of the Empire, to judge from these pamphlets. The Red Jews appear in this context not because they had been sighted by anyone, but because -- given the apocalyptic associations of the Turks, a view assiduously promoted by Luther -- the Red Jews belonged in the picture: they were a traditional and tradition-sanctioned element in the apocalyptic jigsaw puzzle.

By 1596, the Red Jews are even said to have allied themselves with Christendom; they have become a secular nation, like any other. German texts dating from 1607 and 1608 both make it clear that to fairly well-educated writers of the time, the Red Jews were nothing but a vulgar fiction. Around this time, the Red Jews fell into oblivion in the German-speaking lands, as other, more clearly Biblical and more obviously real nations (e.g., Gog and Magog, and the Turks) took their place in the slot reserved for the archenemies and future destroyers of Christendom.

Gog and Magog were, to Luther, 'real' apocalyptic destroyers, sanctioned by Biblical proof-texts, and he found them in the Turks of his own day; the Red Jews were not. The difference between the Red Jews, a people described in medieval romance and popular exegesis (based in part on Biblical sources), and the Biblical Ten Tribes or Gog and Magog was more important to the Reformers and Christians brought up in the Biblicism of the post-Reformation era than it had been to their medieval ancestors and late-medieval contemporaries. 14

The Biblical legend of the Ten Tribes pure and simple, stripped of its medieval association with Gog and Magog, would continue to function in Christian lore, apocalyptic expectations and ethnography until the twentieth century. In the realm of popular religion, Gog and Magog enjoyed less attention, 15 as did their traditional jailer, the Alexander of

14. Ozment argues that, in the sphere of popular religion, the Reformation resulted in a "successful displacement of traditional beliefs and practices", with corresponding consequences; "Social History", 182. My conclusions suggest a somewhat more complex constellation: late medieval 'traditional beliefs and practices' not only operated during the Reformation period, they survived it -- albeit in a very different form. There can be little doubt that a new emphasis on Biblical learning and texts, as opposed to vernacular and Latin commentaries, Historiated Bibles, and abbreviations, helped change the 'canon' and the beliefs and practices of the broad masses. Robert Bast shows in "Honor Your Fathers. Religious Ideology and Social Discipline in Early Modern Germany, 1400-1600" (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Arizona, 1993) that the Reformers' emphasis on the Decalogue as Law, drawn from late-medieval monastic tradition, would have a similar effect on moral ordinances and standards in the Protestant cities and states.

15. At least in German sources; in London, the 'Guildhall Giants' Gog and Magog drew on a tradition according to which these two names referred to giants. See H. Bieling, "Zu den Sagen von Gog und Magog", Wissenschaftliche Beilage zum Programm der Sophien-Realschule, Easter 1882 (Berlin, 1882), 1-23, on the place of 'Gog and Magog' in the popular culture of London from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century. The names 'Gog and Magog' were been applied to the former Soviet Union by right-wing American evangelicals in the context of an expected nuclear apocalypse. This independent exegesis of Ezekiel 38 and Rev. 20 mirrors the widespread medieval habit of seeing in certain peoples -- Huns, Goths, Mongols, Jews or Turks -- the destroyers prophesied in Scripture.
romance. The detail-oriented distinction between the Biblical narratives concerning the Ten Tribes or Gog and Magog, and the medieval legend of the Red Jews marks a divergence in mentality, in standard categories of thought and of legitimate belief, and in the canon of accepted authorities.

2. Scholarship

The 'Red Jews' consistently have baffled the very few scholars who have taken explicit notice of them. No-one has ever been able to make much sense of the name -- perhaps because it has never been placed in a historical and literary context conducive to analysis. In 1989, Helmut Birkhan of the University of Vienna noted three medieval texts in which the Red Jews appear, suggesting that 'rot' (red) in its middle High German sense of 'falseness', 'unfaithfulness' (Judas as exemplar) may explain the term, and concludes inconclusively "In any case, the 'red Jews' are lost, rebellious Jews." In 1979, Christoph Peter Burger noted in his commentary to the

---

5. "Immerhin sind die "roten Juden" verirrte, abtrünnige Juden. Eine Abwertung der Juden schlechthin, ist hier noch nicht deutlich." This last statement -- that the term does not denigrate Jews in general -- is unconvincing. As we will see below, it is based on a pejorative use of 'red' that was applied to Jews in other contexts as well. "Die Juden in der deutschen Literatur des Mittelalters", in: Die Juden in ihrer mittelalterlichen Umwelt. Protokolle einer Ring-Vorlesung gehalten im Sommersemester 1989 an der Universität Wien (= Wiener Arbeiten zur germanistischen Altertumskunde und Philologie, 13), 143-162: 150.
facsimile edition of the 1480 Strasbourg Antichrist und die Fünfzehn Zeichen vor dem Jüngsten Gericht that the name "Red Jews" for the Ten Tribes is as yet unexplained -- the term is also to be found, he notes, in the Younger Titurel.

Friedrich Pfister, the foremost German student of the Alexander cycle, refers in numerous places to the 'Red Jews' of the Alexander novel, but fails to notice that the term crops up only in specific texts, denotes a very precise phenomenon, and never appears in the Latin Alexander novel as such -- only in vernacular reworkings that draw on the Alexander material.

---

1. Except in the middle Swedish version, the Konung Alexander. En medeltids dikt från Latinet vänd i Svenska rim, omkring år 1380, by Bo Jonsson Grip, ed. G.E. Klemming (Stockholm 1862). Concerning the German versions of the Alexander cycle, see "Zu deutschen Alexandergeschichten" in: Kleine Schriften zum Alexanderroman (Meisenheim am Glan, 1976), 228-253, 246; Der Alexanderroman (Ps.-Callisthenes, Historia Alexandri magni de preliis), trans. Friedrich Pfister (Meisenheim am Glan, 1978; Beiträge zur klassischen Philologie, 92), 137.
In his ground-breaking work of 1943, The Devil and the Jews, Joshua Trachtenberg identified the Red Jews as Gog and Magog, the apocalyptic nations enclosed by Alexander, believed throughout the Middle Ages to be identical with the Ten Tribes of Israel, who were to break out and attack Christendom at the time of the Antichrist. Although Trachtenberg recognized the appellation as a standard name for this imaginary people, the evil servants of the Antichrist, he mentioned only one late sixteenth-century source."

In 1930, Andrew Runni Anderson noted the traditionally negative associations of red hair, and cited a few of the medieval and early modern works in which the term Red Jews appears, but offered neither a comprehensive overview, nor any attempt at serious analysis. Anderson's casual manner gives the impression that this story is merely a degenerate version of the accounts contained in Latin works by learned authors." The numerous vernacular medieval and early modern sources featuring the Red Jews which I have found and collected offer strong proof that far from being a degenerate version of learned exegesis, the legend of the Red Jews was a vibrant element of popular religion and popular culture that affected high theology as strongly as it was itself influenced by learned authorities.

---

In a booklet published privately in 1900, Heinrich Loewe discussed the Jews of the Caucasus area in the light of modern knowledge and of a German pamphlet printed in 1596, apparently the only one of the sixteenth-century series of pamphlets concerning the Red Jews with which he was familiar.\(^1\) Concerning the history of the Jews in the Caucasus, he complains, we are dependent on legend and conjecture. When we simply have no clue,

"the Ten Lost Tribes are pressed into service as the easiest means for ignoramuses to spout learned speculations. This does not belong to the realm of legend, but to that of everyday stupidity! The same goes for the search for Gog and Magog".\(^2\)

Loewe mentions the inclusion of warlike Jews in the Caucasus Mountains by Alexander the Great and associations with the Tatars. He notes "one can even hear a soft echo of the waves breaking in the Sambation."\(^1\) There is no sense attacking

\(^1\) Zur Kunde von den Juden im Kaukasus aus zwei alten deutschen Zeitungen (Charlottenberg, 1900).

\(^3\) Loewe, Juden im Kaukasus, 11.
Loewe for his critical approach. The student of medieval culture must look beyond his flat dismissal of traditional legends that were, in their time, authoritative renderings of received, revealed truth. Loewe did not know the textual tradition of the Red Jews. He was interested in the history of the Jews, not in the history of popular Christian belief. However, the pamphlet he saved from oblivion features the Red Jews prominently.

Ludwig Geiger noted, in 1888, the existence of these same 1596 pamphlets and their relation to Christian awareness of the Jewish tradition of messianic hopes concerning the Ten Tribes. He reproduces a few stanzas of this rhymed chronicle, commenting that the poet ‘indulges in the most fantastical exaggeration’ by placing the king of the Red Jews at the head of 900,000 men.

\[\text{\ldots}\]

3. "Die Juden und die deutsche Literatur des 16. Jahrhunderts", in: Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland (1888), 308-372; esp. 363-365; also additions and corrections in the 1889 volume, 295-298. Loewe may well have been alerted to these pamphlets by Geiger’s comments.

4. "Der Liederdichter, der ausdrücklich bemerkt, daß sein Bericht "wehr und nicht erlogen sei", gefällt sich in der ame teuclichsten Übertreibung: er läßt den König an der Spitze von 900,000 Mann stehen." Geiger, "Die Juden und die deutsche Literatur", 364. The numbers are traditional, not fantastical; cf. Victor von Carben’s Judenbüchlein, Appendix A, number 12, which comments on reports of 600,000 Red Jews waiting to attack Christendom: this number from Exodus 12,38 denotes the number of men (not including women and children) who set out from Egypt. Furthermore, Geiger misinterprets an important line of the poem: "Gott woll den Türcken widerstandt thun / mit den rothen Juden zu spot und hon." (see Appendix A.)
The leading nineteenth-century lexicographer Matthias Lexer came across the term in a fifteenth-century chronicle. Since it appeared in a military context, he decided that "rott" meant not red but pack, troop -- which seems less than likely, as the cruel and warlike Jews thus described ("rott Juden") match perfectly the venerable and well-known image of the Red Jews. In 1863, the great Mittelhochdeutsches Wörterbuch of Benecke, Müller and Zarncke noted one example of the term "rotte juden", also offering no explanation apart number 21(a), fol. 4, lines 6-7) as meaning the poet wished the Turks luck in defending themselves against the Red Jews; in fact, the Red Jews are allies of Christendom and God's scourge, whose function is to put the Turks to shame and humiliate them.

Matthias Lexer, Mittelhochdeutsches Handwörterbuch (Leipzig 1876/reprint Stuttgart 1979), vol. II, col. 504. The text is printed as the "Chronik des Burkhard Zink (1368-1468)" in: Die Chroniken der deutschen Städte vom 14. bis ins 16. Jahrhundert, vol. 7 (Leipzig 1966; = Die Chroniken der schwäbischen Städte, Augsburg, vol. II). See Appendix A for the relevant passage and a translation. Five hundred troops of Jews would mean many thousands of Jews under arms. This seems, especially for fifteenth-century France, quite impossible. The tradition of the Red Jews would be applied to other peoples (e.g., the Tatars, by Luther) in the next century: perhaps these soldiers were from the east, of some 'exotic' race. Their number, 500, fits well with the number of Armagnacs (1,000), with whom they are compared and matched for evil and cruelty -- another reason to think of the Red Jews. Finally, the reduplication of consonants even after long vowels (graff) and the elision of endings was common practice, not peculiar to this text; the form "rott-" for red (rot) is found in the next text cited.

G.F. Benecke, W. Müller, F. Zarncke; vol. II, first division (G-M) (Hildesheim, 1986; Leipzig, 1863), 769. The reference is to the Zurich Jahrbuch edited by Ludwig Etzmüller from a reference to the great medievalist Wilhelm Wackernagel, who, in 1848, writing on the topic of medieval German literature, referred to "the oft-mentioned Red Jews". But Wackernagel himself declined to offer any explanation. The term was generally unclear at that time, as shown by the contemporary comments of Ludwig Ettmüller, the editor of two fascinating Zurich Jahrbücher of the fourteenth century. In one of these year-books, the Black Death is blamed on the Jews, who are accused, as elsewhere, of poisoning the wells and streams. The poison itself, however, is said to have come from none other than the Red Jews." Ettmüller admits he does

(see ch. IV and Appendix A, no. 3).

3. Geschichte der deutschen Litteratur. Ein Handbuch (Basel, 1348), part IV, 128-129: W. compares the term "Rotwelsch" (literally, 'red Latinic (language); i.e., thieves' cant; see chapter IV) with the term "Red Jews" in note 4 on page 129: "... den Namen rötwaisch hat im Sinn einer betrüglichen Rede schon das alte Passional 221, 22: er mag in Beziehung stehn auf die öfters erwähnten röten Juden."

4. Die beiden ältesten deutschen Jahrbücher der Stadt Zürich, ed. Ludwig Ettmüller (Zürich, 1844; = Mittheilungen der Antiquarischen Gesellschaft in Zürich, II), 15-96.

5. See Appendix A for text and translation; see chapter 3 for discussion. At the end of his foreword, Müller attempts to explain the rather less usual expressions in his text, writing: "from the red (rotten) Jews: from the rotten Jews? I do not understand the expression; this does not mean soldier-Jews or fiddler-Jews. Perhaps one ought to read: from the rats to the Jews." ("von den rotten juden -- von den verrochten (verroteten) verwalteten juden? ich verstehe den Ausdruck nicht: an rottenjuden. geigeljuden ist nicht zu denken. vielleicht ist zu lesen: von den rotten juden." Ettmüller, Jahrbücher, 19). This last suggestion supposes a more sophisticated knowledge of plague transmission (via rats) than not understand the term. He tries to make sense of it by substituting unlikely variant readings, so keen is he to avoid having to deal with the clear statement that the poison came from 'Red Jews', about which he knows nothing. As early as 1835, one of the authors of a catalogue of books in the ducal library at Gotha threw in the investigative towel and concluded "concerning the appellation red Jews, I am eager to hear from connaisseurs of the medieval fable." While confessing ignorance, he pointed in the right direction.
Unfortunately, the Red Jews have failed ever since to catch the attention of most historians.

Nowhere have the Red Jews been accorded more than a page or two, despite the acknowledgment by Joshua Trachtenberg and leading historians of literature that the Red Jews played a major role in late medieval and early modern apocalyptic belief. More often, scholars have stumbled over the name and was available in the fourteenth century, despite the clear knowledge concerning transmission between humans exhibited in this entry. Furthermore, there is no reason to read the well-established expression "rote Juden", written here with a double "t", as something else, such as "verrotteten", which requires the reader either to exercise considerable fantasy, or to change a vowel and supply a putative demonstrative pronoun: "ratten [den]".

"... über den Beinamen der toten Juden erwartete ich Belehrung von Kennern der mittelzeitigen Fabelwelt." Friedrich Jacobs and G.H.A. Ukert, "Xylographische Werke: Der Endkrist", in: Beiträge zur älteren Literatur, oder: Merkwürdigkeiten der Herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Gotha (Leipzig, 1835), vol. 1, Heft 1, II/6, 114-122; 120-121, note 7.
looked for alternative readings or meanings to explain away this unpasteurized piece of raw medievalia. Historical scholarship has always had difficulty dealing with 'imaginary' phenomena that must seem unreal, improbable or irrational to the modern observer, but which are real, guaranteed by authority and by reason to members of another culture -- the historical study of witchcraft, for example, has just recently broken through that barrier. The 'imaginary' is a category of ours, not of the sources.

1. Historiographical Considerations

The history of ideas has lost much of its luster in the face of sophisticated challenges posed by social history, the Annales school, and more recently, the use of literary and anthropological methods as investigative tools for the study of the past. The history of ruling élites and the history of their ideas have become fields among many others. Nonetheless, ideas cultivated, exchanged and written down by an intellectual or social élite are generally more likely to have survived to the present day, and thus to form the object of scholarly research, than are ideas that circulated, however widely and generally, among that part of the European population that has often appeared, to later observers, to constitute the bulk of the historical iceberg that lurks beneath a small but at least visible peak.
Icebergs have the nasty habit of turning over unexpectedly. Explorers on or too near the peak are in danger of being drowned, or at least swamped, by the uncovering of hitherto invisible regions. Critical scholars have spent the last four or five decades working steadily to overturn the seemingly frozen giant composed of the traditionally important ideas and their history. The most useful result of their critique is the realization that ideas are social as well as intellectual constructs and cannot be detached from the circumstances of their production.

The objection of social historians that the traditional history of ideas is nothing but the history of the ruling élites of Europe must be taken seriously. People belonging to other groups also had ideas, held certain things to be true, articulated arguments and narratives based on their beliefs, and even left lasting records of their intellectual and spiritual activities.

The uncovering and exploration of the 'submerged' portion of the historical mass has become a central interest of historians interested in popular culture, social history and the study of minorities and non-dominant groups. The sources traditionally favored by the historian have proven unequal to the task -- or rather, hitherto neglected types of sources are being tapped to furnish evidence not otherwise available. This study privileges material from vernacular exegetical, literary and documentary texts as access routes to the ideas and beliefs of a section of the population larger than the group who wrote and read 'high theology' and Latin exegetical and historical literature. The courtly vernacular literature of the high Middle Ages, in which the Red Jews make their public debut, was hardly 'popular culture'; however, it was not latinate, and above all it did foreshadow, prepare and influence the developing vernacular genres that would address an ever larger secular audience in the later medieval and early-modern period.

The viewpoint of the Latin authorities (the 'canon') on the topics dealt with here (Jews and the End Time, the Antichrist, etc.) has been adduced in most cases in order to provide points of reference. The similarities and differences thus uncovered provide systematic insights into the ideas, beliefs and comparable cultural constructs articulated in vernacular texts, from the elite poetry of the medieval German nobility to the sensational news pamphlets of the late sixteenth century.

The world of ideas that belonged to the non-Latinate during the later Middle Ages and early modern period are as 'important' (worthy of study), and generally just as interesting, as the ideas held by intellectual élites. The ideas current among those whose voice is not heard in the traditional (usually Latin) sources are not necessarily the same as the ideas of intellectual élites; they may be variations on the latter, or they may have an entirely independent history and existence. If all ideas have a history, then the history of popular conceptions and beliefs concerning, say, the Trinity or the end of time is as necessary to a complete understanding of religion during a given period as is the history of these ideas in 'high theology', even though some quite influential voices have been raised against this distinction. Respect for the ideas and

Cf. the parallel conviction expressed by Natalie Davis that religion ought not to be treated as belonging to "approved" (orthodox, rational) and "disapproved" (superstitious) categories, since all religious behaviour provides groups and individuals with "some sense of the ordering of their world, some explanation for baffling events or injustice, and some notion of who and where they are." "Some Tasks and Themes in the Study of Popular Religion", in: The Pursuit of Holiness in Late Medieval and Renaissance Religion, eds. Charles Trinkaus, Heiko A. Oberman (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1974), 307-312.

"This debate leads far beyond the scope of my discussion. 'Learned' and 'popular' culture have been divorced, remarried and separated in an endless cycle that reflects current ideological priorities more than historical realities. John Van Engen has demonstrated how prevalent the 'two-tiered' model of medieval religion defended by the French historians associated with Jacques LeGoff remains in modern historical writing: 'The Christian Middle Ages as a Historiographical Problem', in: The American Historical Review 91 (1986), 519-552. In his classic study The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity (Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1981), Peter Brown argues..."
piety of non-dominant groups, however, does not in all cases necessitate a blurring of borders. If the sources justify differentiation between different intellectual or social levels, it must be made. Exegetical, literary and documentary sources written in the vernacular provide a range of evidence that is heterogeneous in genre, but often internally compatible on the basis of shared ideas, traditions and convincingly that there was no social or intellectual discontinuity in the cult of the saints between learned and unlearned, cleric and lay. Yet medieval piety, articulated as it was through a vast and deeply-rooted network of religious institutions and enduring popular beliefs, presents a very different historical profile to the modern researcher than does the history of ideas and the concomitant (but harder to reach) history of popular ideas and beliefs. Popular beliefs are not coterminous with the practice of popular piety; beliefs enter into contact with the world of ideas and thought, which is governed but by no means monopolized -- both in the sources, and we may assume, in real life -- by intellectual elites. Religion functions not merely in the narrowly-defined and practical sphere of 'piety', but in many different contexts that can be studied in myriad ways. Cf. Steven Ozment's argument that in the call for a social history of the Reformation, such historians as Robert Scribner have placed social motives ahead of religious ones as determining factors in the Protestant Reformation, and have thus made "social context" "a kind of magical key to human behaviour." Ozment concludes that "the social history of the Reformation" is a subject that cannot be adequately treated in terms of class structure, political power and economic self-interest"; consideration of religious motives ought to lead us to "drop altogether the misleading contrast between history from above and history from below", and to stay close to the historical sources. Ozment, "The Social History of the Reformation: What can we learn from Pamphlets?", in: Flugschriften als Massenmedium der Reformationszeit. Beiträge zum Tübinger Symposium, 1980, ed. Hans-Joachim Köhler (Stuttgart, 1981; = Spätmittelalter und Frühe Neuzeit. 13), 171-203; 176 and 202-203. However, when the sources themselves point to such divisions, which Ozment labels "modern", we have no choice but to listen.
interpretations. This study combines the testimony of widely-differing textual types in an historical enterprise that regards all the evidence available -- literary, exegetical, documentary -- as essential for the reconstruction of lost cultural contexts, forgotten messages and submerged ideas and beliefs.

The history of an idea cannot always be connected intimately with specific people or social groups, at least not in a continuous fashion, yet this is precisely what is needed to respond to the challenges posed by new methods and new priorities: a social history of ideas over the longue durée -- a concept here employed without a declaration of loyalty to the quantitative method which the Annales school applies even to the tracing of pious practice and attitudes. The 'social history of ideas' requires not merely the examination of the social matrix in which various ideas were formed and reproduced, but also, and perhaps more importantly, attention to the broad range of ideas held by differing social groups; such 'ideas' are heterogeneous enough to demand a broader definition, covering what we would call beliefs, fears, 'superstitions' and prophecy. The present study is concerned not with statistics and curves, but rather with long-term changes that can be discerned only through the medium of what Robert Darnton calls 'cultural objects'. These,

"...unlike the price series of economics, the vital statistics of demography, and the (more problematic) professional categories in social history [...] are not manufactured by the historian but by the people he studies. They give off meaning. They need to be read, not counted.”

In reading these ‘cultural objects’, one ought to bear in mind Darnton’s warning against histories of culture that start with the social setting of a character or a phenomenon: cultural phenomena are not produced mechanically by social factors. Such factors cannot, however, be ignored.

The evidence adduced in this study calls for a synthesis of the long-term and the purely contextual approaches: the Latin Biblical scholarship of the twelfth century bequeathed to vernacular textual traditions the main elements of what was to become a medieval legend in the realm of popular belief (the Red Jews); this legend was itself ‘received’ and re-

4. The Great Cat Massacre and Other Episodes in French Cultural History (New York: Vintage Books, 1985), 257. Darnton has furnished the best concise criticism of the application of quantitative methods to what Pierre Chaunu calls the ‘third level’. This is the sphere of culture, which ‘somehow derives’ from the first two levels, namely economics and demography, and which the Annalistes claim to be able to understand via the same means as the first two: statistical analysis, the play of structure and conjuncture, and considerations of long-term change rather than events (257ff.).

5. Darnton, Cat Massacre, 258-259. Here Darnton expresses more elegantly the same concern articulated by Ozment, namely that social context does not produce directly religious (or rather, cultural) phenomena. In most cases, historians of the Middle Ages have better access to the cultural phenomenon (through texts) than they do to the social context that probably influenced, but might or might not have ‘produced’ the outward manifestation.
interpreted in the printed propaganda of the later fifteenth century and the Reformation era. As the 'social setting' in which the legend appears and reappears changes, the uses to which the legend itself is put change correspondingly, and so does the legend -- though there are certain constant, central traits that make it possible to track the legend over time and to speak of it as a popular tradition.

An investigation of the history of an idea or a belief over the long term requires sources that report a continuous or at least a continuing tradition over an extended period. The idea of transubstantiation, for example, can be traced from its earliest origins through its affirmation at the Fourth Lateran Council, its careful elaboration in the works of the schoolmen and commentators of the high and late Middle Ages and its transformation in the sacramentarian controversies of the Reformation in a more or less continuous tradition of texts written, to be sure, by members of an educated élite for a similar audience. Yet even here, in the realm of natural and divine philosophy, not only theologians, but all members of Christian -- and Jewish -- society were involved and affected by controversies concerning

---

"According to the Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique (Paris, 1930), transubstantiation is already present as an idea (though not as a term) in the work of Ignatius (c. 35-c. 107 C.E.), bishop of Antioch: vol. 15, part 1, cols. 1396-1406, esp. 1396-1397."
transubstantiation, from the dukes and princes who were to take sides during the Reformation, through the 'common man' and the most humble and poorest folk, to Jews accused of desecrating the consecrated Host. Even the most high-flown and complex ideas of the schoolmen would be appropriated, evaluated and accepted, rejected or modified by the increasingly large groups of people who began to read theological works when the vernacular pamphlet started to function as a weapon in theological debate in the sixteenth century.

18. Viz. stories of host desecration, the existence of which assumes a Jewish belief in the sacral character of the consecrated Host. Belief in a sinister Jewish 'participation' in the transformed host lasted well into the twentieth century. See, for example, the slanderous article of P. Browe, S.J., "Die Hostienschändungen der Juden im Mittelalter", in Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte 34 (1926), 167-197. For a short discussion of how accusations of host desecration related to accusations of ritual murder, see R. Po-Chia Hsia, The Myth of Ritual Murder. Jews and Magic in Reformation Germany (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988), e.g., the Passau Host Desecration Trial of 1478, 50-54, and passim.

19. See Hans-Joachim Köhler, "The Flugschriften and their Importance in Religious Debate: A Quantitative Approach", in: In: 'Astrologi Hallucinati'. Stars and the End of the World in Luther's Time, ed. Paola Cambelli Berlin/New York: de Gruyter, 1986), 153-175. It is worth noting that the popular pamphlet of the early sixteenth century, like the legend at the heart of this study, was a German phenomenon (including the Netherlands; see the rich collection of pamphlets at the Koninklijke Bibliotheek in The Hague) that had no counterpart in France, Italy or England -- perhaps due to the political Historians of ideas still have not addressed the problems posed, concerning both sources and methodology, by the history of ideas among the 'common people', or even among those who, in the Middle Ages and early sixteenth century, could not read Latin. Such people (the vast majority) were distinguished from the Latinate masters of the language of erudition and intellectual endeavor as idiotae, speakers of an idiom or vernacular language. These illiterati (people ignorant of Latin letters) were defined intellectually by the limits of their idiom and by the type and 'quality' of reading materials available to them. Yet they necessarily thought, and therefore had ideas; they believed, so they must have had beliefs. In the later Middle Ages and Reformation era, Latinate élites usually could read and write their vernacular; most but certainly not all illiterati were illiterate. The barrier was porous in both directions, and the non-Latinate were not necessarily ignorant -- they simply lacked access to many 'original sources', and received certain kinds of information through the filter of translations, summaries, and -- probably -- oral recounting in the vernacular." This is the sort of fragmentation of the Empire, which made it difficult to ban or confiscate works that could not have circulated elsewhere.

'filtered' access to high theology and natural science which the miller Menocchio had, according to Carlo Ginzburg" -- and which most undergraduates today have to the western textual tradition, despite the best efforts of careful translators to bridge the gulf that continues to grow between 'now' and 'then'.

Moreover, the common folk had ideas of their own, ideas that cannot be got at -- at least not directly -- by reading scholastic summae or the theological pamphlets of a Martin Luther or an Ulrich Zwingli, however influential these were.
Only when these representatives of 'high culture' (who were themselves rooted -- to some extent -- in the culture of the people) comment on or criticize the beliefs of the illiterati are such writings of immediate use to the historian of popular culture. Fortunately, other revealing sources are available to the scholar interested in the mental world of the common people in medieval and early modern Europe. Admittedly, the most fertile sources conceivable, letters and diaries of peasants, artisans, burgher-merchants and guildsmen, are not available in any large number, have not been preserved, or never existed. Yet many texts produced for the readers and hearers of vernacular works in this period offer a window, or

---

"The Cheese and the Worms. The Cosmos of a Sixteenth-Century Miller, trans. John and Anne Tedeschi (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1980).
rather a periscope, through which we can garner glimpses of what the common folk (though perhaps not the peasantry and day-laborers\textsuperscript{2}) thought about the Immaculate Conception, the Last Days, or any number of other topics.\textsuperscript{4}

We would make a grave error if we were to continue to ignore the unbroken and unbreakable links between 'high' and 'low' culture. Anthropological methods for discerning what the broad masses believed in early modern times cannot but fall short of the mark if they overlook the genealogical connections between medieval popular belief and treatments of the same themes in Latin theological and exegetical works, in vernacular exegesis, or in courtly and everyday vernacular literature.\textsuperscript{4} Influence runs both from 'high' to 'low' and \textsuperscript{4} Darnton argues that one of the very few ways to get at how peasants thought and what they thought in ancien régime France is to study the written record of oral folklore: "folktales ... are the richest source at our disposal if we want to make contact with the mental world of peasants in the past"; Cat Massacre, 261. Unfortunately, for the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, we have almost no access to this sort of material. Even the most 'popular' printed material was bought primarily by more prosperous groups.

\textsuperscript{4} See, for example, the use made of Stephen of Bourbon's penitential handbook for confessors by Jean-Claude Schmitt in his book The Holy Greyhound: Guinefort, Healer of Children since the thirteenth century, trans. Martin Thom (Cambridge, at the University Press/Paris: Editions de la Maison des Sciences de l'Homme, 1983).

\textsuperscript{4} This is the main criticism to be levelled against the otherwise excellent and path-breaking work of Aron Gurevich, Medieval Popular Culture. Problems of belief and perception, trans. János M. Bak and Paul A. Hollingsworth (Cambridge, at the University Press/Paris: Editions de la Maison des Sciences vice-versa, and we cannot afford to ignore cross-overs that shed light on cultural dynamics that are otherwise inaccessible.

Although Carlo Ginzburg has been criticized for supposed intellectual 'short-circuits' in his reporting of Menocchio's intellectual world -- the ideas of this miller about theology and the natural world as filtered by his intellectual universe and limited out eclectic reading --, Ginzburg has made a beginning toward ascertaining ways and means for the necessarily cautious examination of ideas among the common folk via documents produced by members of a ruling and powerful élite -- in this case, inquisitorial trial protocols. The inquisitors cast Menocchio's ideas in terms familiar to themselves, terms taken from their reading and understanding of the world, theology, and the Bible; yet we are allowed a certain access to Menocchio's intellectual universe through the documentary artifacts produced incidental to the inquisitors' own 'filtering'. Such filtering, we will see, characterized both medieval reception of biblical material and sixteenth-century interpretations of current political events, which were often understood and formulated in terms of medieval legend.

Our own ability to acquire such information is subject to filtration: literary sources, especially those belonging to the more formal, artistic genres, reproduce and distort ideas in often-disputed but nonetheless traditional ways; they also allow glimpses into the intellectual world of contemporary readers and listeners via the ideas communicated to them -- some of which were new, some of which were already known to these readers and were thus confirmed as valuable and lasting. On the other hand, non-literary sources, such as chronicles and most sixteenth-century pamphlets, sometimes offer more direct, less formally encoded information about the ideas and mental constitution of their authors and reading public. Any attempt to reconstruct the mental world or mentality of a past time would do well, therefore, to look to both literary and other, non-fictional or non-literary sources as a kind of 'control group'. These texts must also be 'interrogated' if they are to yield answers useful to the historian. Origins and context must be examined. However, as Bloch notes, the origin or ancestry of a word -- or of an

15. See, for example, Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning: From More to Shakespeare (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980) for a critical 'reading' of the hegemonic function of literature as a "strategy of containment". Greenblatt is dependent, however, on literary texts as sources, so it is hardly surprising that he is forced to maintain the privileged status of the literary text "...in part because...great art is an extraordinarily sensitive register of the complex struggles and harmonies of a culture..." (Ibid., 3).
historical phenomenon -- is by no means a causal explanation. Rather, the social conditions of the moment must be considered: a historical phenomenon can hardly be understood apart from its moment in time.

The task at hand is to unravel the range of meanings available to contemporary readers in the diverse but thematically linked texts presented here. This job requires the commentator to dismember texts in order to 'dig out' the component parts of narratives which had in their totality an emotional and psychological impact far beyond that of their individual elements. The risk entailed by analysis is that the immediacy and urgency of such documents as apocalyptic prophecy or news from the battle front can be buried under a landslide of facts and dates. Yet without historical analysis, we cannot approach a contextual understanding of such texts -- including the traditions they drew on and the audience they addressed.

The vernacular literature of medieval Germany is in no danger of being overlooked by scholarship -- legions of university professors both in Germany and the English-speaking world are devoted to its ever more minute and detailed study. History, however, tends to shy away from literary sources as too formal, too formulaic, too 'fictional'. Recent trends in literary theory have tended to discourage the belief that a modern reader can learn something about the past through the analysis of literary works. The study of the literary text as a self-referential universe is a hermeneutic snipe-hunt that makes literature seem both obsolete and useless. 'Indeterminacy' has replaced 'aesthetic artificiality' or 'fictionality' as the excuse of choice for failing to integrate the study of literature into history, except as a witness to the unpredictable nature of communication and other similarly earth-shattering discoveries.

---

Vernacular literature has much to contribute to the study of mentality and popular culture in medieval Germany. Certain popular genres outside the mainstream of Minnesang and courtly epic have received very little attention from scholars of literature because they are too 'low', not sufficiently artistic or elaborate: popular plays, Historiated Bibles, epic poems, Volksbücher, sermons, catechetical works and the like.

Furthermore, and perhaps more importantly, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries appear degenerate to the student of Minnesang, and medieval to the student of early modern literature -- as does much that survives into the sixteenth century. 'Exegetical' works in the vernacular -- i.e., works that interpret religious or Biblical themes to a lay readership -- appear too simplistic, or even derivative, for serious study to students of medieval theology, and too religious to students of what modern scholarship is pleased to define as literature -- an artistic pastime seemingly divorced from all other aspects of society.

In general, German-language literature has been dismissed as derivative of foreign, especially Gallic, genres such as trovaritz. There is little point in rehearsing the varying points of view, scholarly, spiritual and national that have put their stamp on the study of medieval literature: they get in the way of understanding literature in historical terms and lead to fruitless philosophical and technical wrangles about aesthetics, meter, sources and genres. This study is concerned to gather evidence from vernacular sources literary and otherwise, avoiding overly neat distinctions that belong in the undergraduate lecture-hall (if anywhere).

The culture and beliefs of the later Middle Ages have fallen between the cracks in scholarship. The university habit of dividing disciplines into specialties according to the object of study -- historians study documents, professors of language and literature dissect the 'great' (or politically 'representative') literary texts, anthropologists examine oral cultures -- and the pervasive influence of Burckhardtian periodization still stifles the examination of continuities between medieval and early modern culture.

The frenzied apocalyptic expectations of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, part and parcel of the religious ferment that found its most focused expression in the Protestant Reformation, grew out of and adapted medieval traditions, including that of the Red Jews. These traditions do not simply disappear with the advent of critical historiography and critical interpretation of the Bible. Apocalypticism participates here in a much broader phenomenon, that of late-medieval antisemitism, which was directed at the (remaining) Jews of Europe and Jews in general as religious and secular enemies. The legend of the savage Red Jews provides an important bridge between apocalyptic hopes or fears and the demonization of the Jews as a prelude (and post-mortem) to their murder or expulsion."

". See Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews; see also Heiko A. Oberman, "The Stubborn Jews. Timing the Escalation of Antisemitism in Late Medieval Europe" concerning the changes that led to the late-medieval preoccupation with the Antichrist and his servants, the blind and stubborn Jews.
II. APOCALYPTICISM AND MESSIANISM: CHRISTIAN AND JEWISH PERSPECTIVES ON THE END IN LATE ANTIQUITY AND THE MIDDLE AGES

From late antiquity to the high Middle Ages, two stories about events to come at the End of Time dominated exegetical and literary discussion of the final things. Among Christians, the epochal event foreseen for the time of tribulation was the descent on Christendom of the destroyers Gog and Magog, prophesied in Ezekiel 38-39 and the Book of Revelation 20,7-8. This final chastisement would precede the Last Judgement and the end of suffering on earth. This prophecy became entangled with literary works that featured a strong prophetic element, and Gog and Magog became inextricably linked with the figure of Alexander the Great. Among Jews, the exile of the ten northern tribes of Israel (II Kings 17,6) and their fabled return (IV Ezra 39-50) to save their dispersed co-religionists from bondage in the Diaspora functioned along the lines of traditional messianic hopes. Where Christians feared the advent of Gog and Magog (while also hoping for their speedy appearance, to hurry on the course of salvation-history), the exiled Jews waited for a sign that the Ten Tribes were on the march. Given the striking similarity of these tales (despite their very different origins), it should come as no surprise that they became entangled, even confused, with one another. Christians came to identify the Ten Tribes as Jewish destroyers of Christendom, even as Gog and Magog.
Simultaneously, the Messiah awaited by the Jews would be identified, from very early in the history of Christianity, with the Antichrist, the most common term for the Beast foretold in Revelation 13. The Red Jews were to play a key role in German-language texts, uniting all these disparate and menacing confusions into a Christian conglomerate of apocalyptic and antisemitic anxiety. This fusion reveals essential features of popular Christian perceptions of the Jews in medieval and early modern Europe.

1. The 'Unclean' Peoples and Gog and Magog

At the beginning of the Common Era, Flavius Josephus wrote that Alexander closed with iron gates the mountain pass through which the Scyths might break into the civilized world. In another work, he identifies the Scyths with Magog. However, Anderson feels that this does not mean that by the time of Josephus, the legend of the gate built by Alexander to exclude the 'unclean peoples' had come to mean a gate built to enclose Gog and Magog. He bases his contention on the later

---

Anderson engages Friedrich Pfister in a debate over the origins of the idea that Alexander built his gate, somewhere in the Caucasus ('Caspian Mountains'), to keep Gog and Magog out of the civilized world. To Pfister, this was a Jewish legend of some antiquity, and current at the time of Josephus, as attested to by the various implicit equations of 'divergences of view' concerning the identity of the peoples enclosed by Alexander, which 'would hardly have come into being' had the enclosed peoples been identified as Gog and Magog at the time of Josephus. Pfister, on the other hand, claims that the legend of Alexander's Gate having been built to enclose Gog and Magog was of Jewish origin and came from first-century Alexandria (based on earlier Jewish stories of Alexander as a hero of Jewish history). This argument alone can make sense of the implicit equation made by Josephus. Yet Anderson's arguments concerning details, such as the later date and origin of the Gog-and-Magog episode in Pseudo-Callisthenes C (iii,26), refute much of Pfister's case. This is not the proper venue to take sides. The careful scholarship of Anderson and Pfister, who devoted decades to the specific study of this topic, deserves closer study than can be accorded it here. The point is that at some time before the twelfth century, when the story of 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' was conflated with the Jewish legend of the Ten the Scyths with those enclosed and with Magog: Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 19 and 20, note 1.

2. Anderson, Alexander's Gate, deals with Gog and Magog and the literary tradition from the time of Josephus on in his first two chapters, 7-14 and 15-57.
Tribes, Alexander was credited with having enclosed Gog and Magog behind the gate he is said to have built in the Caucasus.

The Alexander legend of later antiquity, based broadly on Josephus' recounting, tells how Alexander, marching eastward, came upon wild peoples (feras gentes) or unclean peoples (immundas gentes), who ate human flesh and had other equally vile customs. To keep them from destroying the rest of the world, Alexander drove them between two mountains. then asked God to push the two mountains together and imprison them. This story found its way not only into later versions of the Alexander legend, but also into the Qur'an and the influential Greek Revelations of Pseudo-Methodius, which date

---

... Another topic that has greatly exercised scholars is the precise location of this gate. The literature is immense: see, for example, Richard Hennig, "Sallam der Dolmetscher an der 'Gog und Magog-Mauer' (um 845)", in: Terrae Incognitae II (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1950), 169-185, and Michael Jan de Goeje, "De muur van Gog en Magog", in: Verslagen den Mededeelingen der K. Akademie van Wetenschappen, Letterkunde, 1. Reeks [series], Deel [part] 5 (1888), 87-124.

from the end of the seventh century. Around 700 C.E., this latter text was translated into Latin by the monk Peter, of Merovingian Gaul, and very widely disseminated in the west, where it was a standard of Christian apocalypticism. In this version, the unclean peoples originally thought to have been enclosed by Alexander were identified with Gog and Magog, the apocalyptic destroyers of Ezekiel 38-39 and Revelation 20,8.10

The Revelationes enjoyed an uninterrupted popularity; they

---

Anderson cites Ernst Sackur to the effect that during the Middle Ages, the influence of Pseudo-Methodius was second only to that of the Canon and the church fathers. The reason was that "as Christendom was threatened by each new peril in the later centuries of the middle ages -- the Mongol invasions and the westward advance of the Turks even to the walls of Vienna -- Christendom in its direst need and darkest hour found in Pseudo-Methodius not only hope but even assurance of final victory." Anderson, Alexander’s Gate, 49.

To Bernard McGinn, the Revelations were, after the Book of Daniel and the Revelation of John, one of the most influential and widespread of medieval apocalyptic texts: Visions of the End, 70, citing D. Verhelst, "La préhistoire des conceptions d’Adson concernant l’Antichrist", in: Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 40 (1973), 52-103. Verhelst has counted 190 mss. of the Latin version alone, of which 21 are anterior to the twelfth century (95). On the Syrian origins of the text see Michael Kmosko, "Das Ratsel des Pseudomethodius," in: Byzantium (1931), 282-91, and Ernst Sackur, Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen (Halle, 1898), 46-47, 56.

The history of transmission has been carefully traced by Anderson, Alexander’s Gate, 15-57, and by George Cary, The Medieval Alexander, 9-68; for the Middle Ages, see Cary and D.J.A. Ross, Alexander Historiatus.
were printed in numerous editions during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Gog and Magog were, in all these versions, enclosed only temporarily: at the end of time, God would allow them to escape from their prison and devastate Christendom. The Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius also prophesied that the Antichrist would deceive and gather in the scattered Jews to Jerusalem, where they would serve him as their Messiah, a vilification easily recognizable as a hostile reading of the apocryphal fourth book of Ezra. This element is based on the prophecy of the Tiburtine Sibyl, and would prove to be most prophetic indeed for the medieval development of the story of Gog and Magog: here is where apocalypticism meets antisemitism.

The Historia de preliis magni Alexandri started out with the title Nativitas et victoria Alexandri Magni. This was a tenth-century Latin translation, by the Archpresbyter Leo of Naples, of the Greek Alexander romance by the Pseudo-Callisthenes; it proved very popular in Latin and in numerous vernacular translations, and was printed early on as the Historia de preliis Alexandri magni.¹ The later, interpolated versions of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, especially \(^1\) (between 1185 and 1236), describe the enclosure of Gog and Magog by Alexander to protect the world from these savage nations. This story was a ‘best-seller’ throughout the Middle Ages and into the early modern era; it was printed in numerous versions, both Latin and vernacular.

¹ There are three different recensions, and over forty-five known manuscripts survive. Some twenty works in Latin, Italian, German, Czech, Polish, Magyar, Russian, Middle English and perhaps Hebrew are based on it: Hoyt Duggan and Thorlac Thurville-Petre, eds., The Wars of Alexander (Oxford, at the University Press, 1989), xiii. The most recent critical translation into a modern language is the German edition by Friedrich Pfister, Der Alexanderroman mit einer Auswahl aus

Not only did versions of these ‘canonical’ texts continue to circulate until well past the Reformation, the stories they contained seeped into all manner of medieval exegetical and literary works. Gog and Magog became a topos of salvation-history.\(^2\)

2. The Ten Tribes

\(^{1}\) Den verwandten Texten (Meisenheim am Glan, 1978); esp. 134-137 and 188. Pfister is by far the most prolific scholar on this topic; he has also written a definitive study of the Alexander story in late medieval German letters: "Studien zu spätmittelalterlichen deutschen Alexandergeschichten", in: Kleinere Schriften, 228-253; orig. in Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum ?? (1942), 114-132, and "Alexander der Große in den Offenbarungen der Griechen, Juden, Mohammedaner und Christen", in Kleinere Schriften, 101-347; orig. in the series Schriften der Sektion für Altertumswissenschaft der Deutschen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, vol. \(n\) (Berlin, 1956).

\(^{2}\) For a selection of texts, starting with the 'originals' and moving through their reception in medieval Germany, see Appendix 9.
The story of the ten lost tribes is based on the

The most complete scholarly accounting of the story of the Ten Lost Tribes in Jewish sources, thought and belief was furnished just over one hundred years ago by Adolf Neubauer in his monumental and deceptively-titled series of articles "Where are the Ten Tribes?" The possible survival of the Ten Tribes in the east or Far East has exercised the imagination of Christians and Jews alike since time immemorial. The search has often been motivated by religious and political goals. See, for example, Richard H. Popkin, "The Rise and Fall of the Jewish Indian Theory" in: Menasseh Ben Israel and his World, ed. Yosef Kaplan, Henry Méchoulan and Richard H. Popkin (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1989), 53-82. Based on the tale that the aboriginal inhabitants of the Amazon basin were Jewish and therefore descendants of the Ten Tribes, Menasseh Ben Israel hoped to persuade Oliver Cromwell that the re-admission of the Jews to England would help spread Jewry to all corners of the earth and therefore speed the coming of the Messiah. For the text of his Hope of Israel and the pamphlets written to persuade Cromwell, see Menasseh Ben-Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell. Being a reprint of the Pamphlets published by Menasseh Ben-Israel to promote the Re-Admission of the Jews to England, ed. Lucien Wolf (London: Macmillan, 1901). For a thorough and learned discussion of the possible descendants of the Ten Tribes (i.e., the Asiatic Jewish communities of the 'Assyrian dispersion'), see the classic work by the former president of Israel, Itzhak Ben-Zvi, The Exiled and the Redeemed, trans. Isaac A. Abbad (Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society of America, 1961). In 1851, J. Wichelshaus published a learned but rather naïve and inconclusive study concerning the possible geographical dispersion of the Ten Tribes: "Der Exil der zehn Stämme Israels", in: Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgen-ländischen Gesellschaft 5 (Leipzig 1851), 467-482. For a review of the less likely claimants to descent from the Ten Tribes (e.g., the Japanese Judaizers), see Tudor Parfitt's highly readable The Thirteenth Gate. Travels among the Lost Tribes of Israel (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987). Shalva Weil has put together an admirable, though impressionistic, overview in her exhibition catalogue Beyond the Sambatycn: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes (Tel Aviv: Beth Hatefutsoth, The Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, 1991). See also Allen H. Godbey, The Lost Tribes: A Myth - Suggestions Towards Rewriting Hebrew History (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1930), esp. ch. 1, for a very earnest, rationalistic, yet curiously incomplete debunking of the Lost Tribes myth. Godbey turns his attention to all the Jewish communities of the Diaspora and many communities falsely said Biblical account of the Ten Tribes of Israel led into captivity in the east by the king of Assyria, Salmanassar (II Kings 17). The apocryphal fourth book of Ezra (end of the first century CE) relates the exile of the Ten Tribes and their future return to serve the Messiah on Mount Zion. They are beyond the Euphrates, the flow of which God stopped in order to let them cross. When God wills it, he will stop the flow of the river once again, when it comes time for the Ten Tribes to return. 4 Josephus refers to "ten tribes beyond the Euphrates, countless myriads whose numbers cannot be ascertained". 5 There is a great deal of speculation as to the whereabouts of these tribes in the Mishnah, the Jerusalem Talmud and the Babylonian Talmud. 6 According to some, the exiled Ten Tribes eventually disappeared because they were to be of Jewish origin, but to none of the older stories concerning the Ten Tribes.

5. Antiquities 11, ch. 5.2. Josephus also refers to Sabbatic river, though in his account it is dry for six days and runs on the Sabbath, and has not yet been associated with the ten tribes.

6. See Israel Lévi, "La légende d'Alexandre dans le Talmud et le Midrasch" in: Revue d'Etudes Juives 7 (1887), 78-93. Lévi points out that the place the Ten Tribes were said to be was often called Africa, which, however, over time came to mean "des régions mystérieuses de l'Asie" (3). sinful and assimilated with gentiles.\textsuperscript{17}

In the context of the Bar Kochba rebellion (132-135 CE), \textsuperscript{17} Babylonian Talmud, \textit{Shabbat} 147b; The Babylonian Talmud, Seder Mo'ed, "Shabbath", ed. Rabbi Isidore Epstein, trans. H. Freedman, vol. II (London: The Soncino Press, 1938), 750: "R. Helbo said: The wine of Perugitha [a place in northern Israel famous for its wine] and the water of Diomsith cut off the Ten Tribes from Israel." [translator's note: They were so much pre-occupied with these pleasures that they neglected learning and lost faith, which ultimately led to their exile and disappearance.]; see also Numbers Rabbah 9,1. The discussion in Yebamoth, however, which concerns degrees of 'tainted descent' and the status of Jews of mixed descent before the law, takes a very different line: The Babylonian Talmud, Seder Nashim, "Yebamoth", ed. Rabbi Isidore Epstein, trans. Rev. Israel W. Slotki, vol. I (London: The Soncino Press, 1936), 16b, 90-91: "Rab Judah said in the name of R. Assi: If at the present time a heathen betroths [a daughter in Israel], note must be taken of such betrothal since it may be that he is of the ten tribes. [translator's note: Whom Shalmaneser had carried away into captivity (II Kings 18,11)] where they intermarried with the heathens. Children born from such marriages are bastards...];...; R. Abba b. Kahana said: And he put them in Halah and in Habor, on the river of Gozan, and the cities of the Medes [II Kings 18,11-12]; Halah is Halwan [a locality in Assyria], and Habor is Hadyab [Adiabene, a region in Assyria], the river Gozan is Ginzak [Ganzaka, in north-western Persia], and the cities of the Medes are Hamdan [Hamadan, capital of Media, a.k.a. Ecbatana] and its neighbouring towns; others say, Nahar [Nahawand, a town south of Ecbatana] and its neighbouring towns. Which are its neighbouring towns? -- Samuel responded: Karak [or K'rack, fort], Moshki [a land to the south of Colchis], Hidki [in Assyria] and Dumkia [the fort of) Rumki in Media].

R. Johanan said: All these were enumerated in order to declare them as being unfit [translator's note: Most of their inhabitants being deemed bastards, since the women had intermarried with the heathens, and their descendants, furthermore, married forbidden relatives.]." The discussion then turns to those descended from 'Israelitish' women, and who are therefore 'fit', and those descended from heathen women, who are not. This discussion seems to provide sufficient cause, if it were sought, for excluding the remnants of the Ten Tribes from Israel, by declaring them to have assimilated with the heathen.
Rabbi Akiba (martyred in 135 C.E.) argued that despite popular hopes, "the Ten Tribes shall not return again." Rabbi Eliezer countered, expressing the majority opinion when he wrote: "Like as days grow dark and then grow light, so also after darkness is fallen upon the Ten Tribes, shall light hereafter shine upon them". The Talmud places the Lost Tribes beyond the river Sambation, which is impassible, though Mishnah Sanhedrin 10.1 (110b); The Babylonian Talmud, Seder Nezikin "Sanhedrin" II, ed. Rabbi Isidore Epstein, trans. H. Freedman (London: The Soncino Press, 1935), 759: "The Ten Tribes will not return [to Palestine], for it is said, And cast them into another land, as is this day: [Deut. 29.27] Just as the day goes and does not return, so they too went and will not return: This is R. Akiba's view. R. Eliezer said: As this day -- just as the day darkens and then becomes light again, so the Ten Tribes -- even as it went dark for them, so will it become light for them." Shalva Weil argues that "Rabbi Akiba probably held this particular view, which was not the majority view, because he deeply believed that Bar-Kochba was the Messiah. Since Bar-Kochba was clearly unable to fulfil one of the tasks of the Messiah -- the ingathering of all the "lost ones" of Israel for the purposes of Redemption -- Rabbi Akiba apparently sought to eliminate this responsibility with his pronouncement that the Ten Lost Tribes would never return." (Beyond the Sambation, 92). The Gemara discussion that follows the Mishnah (above) relates various Rabbis' positions concerning the part the Ten Tribes might have in the Messianic age and the hereafter [e.g., they will have a part in the hereafter if they repent], then moves quickly to a more general discussion of who will receive a portion of the world to come and who will not, which is the larger context of the chapter.

Idem.
it ceases to flow on the Sabbath, when Jews cannot cross it.\textsuperscript{31}

In contrast, Josephus says the Sambation runs dry all week, but flows on the Sabbath.\textsuperscript{2} Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, reports that the Sambation flows during the week and rests on the Sabbath.\textsuperscript{3} This Jewish tale was not confined to Jewish sources. It would continue to influence Western thinking about eastern geography and the whereabouts of the Ten Tribes for centuries to come. Jewish belief in the future return of the Ten Tribes -- in spite of the negative verdicts of some Talmudic sages and judges -- would likewise continue uninterrupted for many centuries, exerting a considerable influence on Christian apocalyptic thought and belief.

The story of the Ten Tribes entered the world of geopolitics via the highly popular tale of Eldad the Danite (ha-Dani).\textsuperscript{4} This ninth-century account (which enjoyed an

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{31} Genesis Rabbah 73,6: "The tribes of Judah and Benjamin were not exiled to the same place as the Ten Tribes; for the latter were transported beyond the river Sambatyon." (Weil, Beyond the Sambatyon, 32)
  \item \textsuperscript{2} Jewish Wars, 7, 98-99.
  \item \textsuperscript{3} Natural History, 3, 24.
  \item \textsuperscript{4} See the English translation by Adolf Neubauer, in his "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 99-104. Neubauer notes that this tale was to become the Arabian Nights of the Jews, and found a large audience in Arabic translation and among Christians in Latin and German translations (99). Neubauer details the Hebrew editions and translations, including the many printed editions, up to the nineteenth century (110–114). The ninth-century diary of the traveller Eldad has been preserved in two versions: a letter of 383 to the Jews of Spain (this letter was mentioned a century later by Rabbi Hisdai ibn Shaprut in a letter to Joseph, king of the Khazars, a Tatar tribe that converted to Judaism around 740 C.E.; a manuscript version is at Christ Church College Library, Oxford; reproduced by Shalva Weil [Beyond the Sambatyon, 13]; Adler [see below] translates the letter and the response from Joseph, and claims they are both authentic), printed in Hebrew in 1480; and in a letter from the rabbis of Qairouan to the Gaon Zemah of Babylonia, asking whether the story could be true (printed at Constantinople in 1519). The Gaon, if his answer is authentic, believed the tale in its entirety: "The belief in Eldad by such an authority as the Gaon, can only be explained by the delight which he and the other Rabbis must have felt on hearing of the prosperous state of the lost tribes, coupled, perhaps, with the hope of a sudden restoration of the Jewish nation." (Neubauer, 108). As we shall see, this belief and this hope were endemic among European Jews in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and lived on in folklore for many centuries thereafter. For a more recent edition of Eldad's story, see Elkan Nathan Adler's translations of Eldad's letter to the Jews of Spain and of the 1519 Constantinople print [the letter from the rabbis of Qairouan to the Gaon Zemah, in Adler (ed.), Jewish Travellers (London: George Routledge & Sons, Ltd., 1930, 4-21; see also his translation of Hisdai ibn Shaprut's letter to the Khazar king, in which Hisdai asks from which of the Lost Tribes the Khazars descend, and the response: from none, but from 'Japhet through his son Togarma': 22-16."

uninterrupted vogue among Jewish readers down to the nineteenth century) reported on the very real existence of numerous Jewish communities to the east of the Holy Land. Eldad's narrative interprets these communities as the descendants of the Ten Tribes, who were scattered to the 'East', to Arabia and to Africa. Here ethnography, Talmudic science and biblical tradition form a seamless whole. The Sambation, beyond which the Ten Tribes are exiled, is described as a river of stones and dust that rumbles all week but is still on the Sabbath, when it is walled off by fire\textsuperscript{35} or covered by a cloud that prevents anyone from touching it.\textsuperscript{36}

Eldad also addresses the eschatological dimension concerning the redemption of all Israel: "The Holy One, blessed be he, who made us to know good tidings concerning our brethren, the Ten Tribes, he will gather our scattered ones from the four corners of the earth to the Temple together with all Israel's brethren."\textsuperscript{37} Eldad mentions a warlike east African kingdom inhabited by some of the Ten Tribes -- a clear reference to the powerful kingdom of the Falasha. He also refers to the tribes of Simeon and Manasseh, who live near the land of the Khazars,\textsuperscript{38} six months' travel north-east of Jerusalem.

\textsuperscript{35} As in the letter to the Jews of Spain: "The river Sambatyon is 200 yards broad, "About as far as a bowshot" (Gen. 21,16), full of sand and stones, but without water [...]. And this river of stone and sand rolls during the six working days and rests on the Sabbath day. As soon as the Sabbath begins, fire surrounds the river, and the flames remain till the next evening, when the Sabbath ends. Thus no human being can reach the river for a distance of half a mile on either side [...]." Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 102; Adler, Jewish Travellers, 14.

\textsuperscript{36} As in the letter to the Gaon Zemah, which places the sons of Dan on the other side of the Sambation: Adler, Jewish Travellers, 18.

\textsuperscript{37} Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 104.

\textsuperscript{38} Although the existence of a fabled Jewish kingdom north of the Caucasus and between the Don and the Volga was long denied by Christian commentators for religious reasons, the kingdom of the Khazars certainly did exist. The nomadic Khazars coalesced into a kingdom in the seventh century. Arthur Koestler has argued persuasively that they were instrumental, during the seventh and eighth centuries, in Ethiopia, 'Azania' [east Africa], Armenia, the Euphrates, the lands of the Medes and Persians, 'the mountains near Mecca' and the land of the Khazars\(^a\) are all inhabited by descendants of the Ten Tribes and are all located in proximity to each other! This story received wide circulation, and contains many stemming the Muslim tide at the Caucasus and preventing the forces of the Caliphate from gaining a foothold in eastern Europe: Arthur Koestler, The Thirteenth Tribe. The Khazar Empire and its Heritage (London: Hutchison & Co., 1976), 13-16. During the course of the eighth century, their rulers and the military elite adopted Judaism, the dominant religion of the neighbouring Caucasian tribes, the Georgians and Armenians (Ben-Zvi, The Exiled and the Redeemed, 256-257). Ben-Zvi cites A.N. Poliak's argument that the Khazar kingdom was not destroyed entirely by Svatoslav, Prince of Kiev, during his campaign of 965-969 (when the Khazar capital, Itil, at the mouth of the Don, fell), but survived in contracted form until the Mongol invasions of 1224. (Poliak, The History of a Jewish Kingdom in Europe [in Hebrew], Tel Aviv: Mossad Bialik, 1951). D.M. Dunlop’s still-useful The History of the Jewish Khazars (New York: Schocken Books, 1967/Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1954) has been supplemented by the highly technical work of Peter B. Golden, Khazar Studies. An Historico-Philological Inquiry into the Origins of the Khazars (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1980, 2 vols.), which makes extensive use of the enormous literature on this topic in Hungarian, Russian and Arabic, and by the source editions and translations of Norman Golb and Omeljan Pritsak, Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century (Ithaca/London: Cornell University Press, 1982). The tenth-century letter of Hisdai ibn Shaprut, Nasi (prince) of the Spanish Jews to Joseph, King of the Khazars, has been discussed above. It is interesting that Hisdai should assume that the Khazars were one of the Ten Tribes, when in fact they were of Turkic stock, and traced their lineage from Japhet. The reputation, and later the memory, of the Khazar kingdom may have contributed to stories of an independent Jewish realm in the east, which both Jews and Christians naturally saw through a biblical filter that made sense of the existence of such Jews only as descendants of the Ten Tribes.

\(^a\) Variant reading: of the Babylonians; Adler, Jewish Travellers, 3.
of the core elements that would be repeated in later stories of this kind.¹⁰

Neubauer summarily lists other early medieval references to the exiled Israelites. The Arabic translations of the books of Kings and Chronicles by Saadyah Gaon (died c. 941) have been lost, but certain passages are preserved in the Arabic 'Art of Poetry' by Moses ben Ezra (eleventh century). Saadyah is reported to have said: "And such was the case with the other exiles of Samaria, who went to the lands of Khorasan, for there is not the slightest doubt that Halah, Habor, the river of Gozan, and the cities of the Medes (II Kings 17,6), are to be found in Khorasan. Habor is most probably the river Khaboor (Chaboras of Ptolomey, which is written "מ" as well as "מ"). All this is well known here." To this Moses ben Ezra adds that in those provinces, there were still 40,000 Jews who paid tribute.¹¹

Judah ben Balam (fl. c.1020) follows Saadyah: "in the time of Josiah the tribes were in Khorasan, for Habor is most probably the Chaforas, and the Gozan is to be found near the town of Gazna..." R. Tanhum of Jerusalem (thirteenth century) also relies on Saadyah: "these towns are in the land of

¹⁰. See esp. Adolf Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 185-188, for a brief history of this tale between the time of Eldad and the time of Benjamin of Tudela (tenth to twelfth centuries).

¹¹. Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 186.
Khorasan; Gozan is, as it is said, the river of Gazna, and Habor is the Khabur. 12

Benjamin of Tudela 11 visited the Holy Land, Mesopotamia, Bahrain, Aden, India, Ceylon and perhaps Tibet and China between 1165 and 1173. During his travels he encountered and heard of many Jewish communities in Asia, some numbering, he claims, in the tens and even the hundreds of thousands, which he took to be descended from various tribes of the exiled Israelites. He makes a particular point of noting the quasi-regal honours accorded to the Jewish Exilarch at Baghdad, explaining that the Great Caliph was complying with Mohammed's injunction "to give effect to what is written in the law, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah nor a law-giver from between his feet' until the Shiloh (Messiah) comes." Neubauer translates another passage from Benjamin's travelogue that

11. Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 186-187.

12. Rabbi Benjamin ben Jonah of Tudela (in Navarre) finished his travels in 1173; he set out in 1165. His travelogue enjoyed widespread popularity both in Hebrew and in translation. The passages concerning the Jewish communities of Asia, supposed by Benjamin to be descended from the Ten Tribes, are reproduced by Adler, Jewish Travellers, 38-63; and in very abbreviated form by Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 189-192.

4. Adler, Jewish Travellers, 48. This important point, a weapon in arguing against the Christian interpretation of Genesis 49,10 (according to which the proof that the Messiah had already come was that the sceptre had departed from Judah, as no Jewish kingdoms were left on earth), is explicit here, but implicit in most other Jewish descriptions of the kingdoms of the Ten Tribes.
describes a nation of warlike Jews, the Khaibar, located twenty-one days' journey through the Arabian desert from 'Hella' in Babylonia. Benjamin refers to Habor, the river Gozan and the cities of the Medes from the relevant passage in II Kings as to real places where there are Israelites, descendants, he claims, of those carried into exile by Salmanasar. In particular, he mentions many communities along the river Gozan.

The Jews of the Middle Ages believed the Ten Tribes still existed somewhere in the fabulous east. The apostate Joshua Lorca (Hieronymus de Sancta Fide) claimed to have found in the

"They possess large and strong cities and are not subject to any of the nations, but undertake warlike expeditions into distant provinces [...]. The Jews are the terror of their neighbours [they are also very pious and learned, he continues]. There are altogether 300,000 Jews [...]. It is reported that these Jews are of the tribes of Reuben, Gad and half the tribe of Menasseh, who were led away captives by Salmanesser, King of Assyria, and brought there. They built there strong cities, and are in warfare with many kingdoms, and they cannot easily be reached because of their situation, which requires a march of eighteen days through uninhabited deserts, and thus renders them difficult of access." Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 191-192.
letters of Maimonides that the Ten Tribes were a great nation. Part of this nation was ruled by the Persian 'Great Sultan', part was independent and located near the land of Prester John, with whom they were allied. In one of his responsa. Abraham, the son of Maimonides, answers a question concerning the Ten Tribes, who are said to be in the desert (or 'in distant corners'), that he can only refer to the passages of the Talmud, the Midrashim, the story of Eldad the Danite, his letter and its description of the ritual rules of the Ten Tribes, as well as some Hebrew words Eldad says they use. Abraham relied on the traditional authorities, which generally supported the authenticity of the story. However, he was not willing to give details in the absence of sure knowledge or personal experience. By contrast, Arab-speaking and other near-eastern Jewish commentators more familiar with the geography of Asia Minor were keen to locate the Ten Tribes in areas of which they had some knowledge. Abraham may not have believed implicitly in the existence of the Lost Israelites or their descendants, but the claims of Joshua Lorca and the

8. Neubauer, "Where are the "Ten Tribes?", 195, note 2: "desert" if we read aleph, resh, chet, 'ayin; the ms. has 'distant corners', aleph, resh, chet, samech.

9. Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 195.
question posed to Abraham suggest that in the Middle Ages, many Jews -- even learned Jews -- did believe the Ten Tribes still existed.

3. The Later Middle Ages

The burning desire of the Jews for their Messiah was a widespread piece of 'common knowledge'. It is all the more interesting since we know not only that European Jewry experienced a groundswell of Messianic hopes in the wake of the numerous expulsions in the fifteenth century, but also that this Messianic hope was intimately connected with the belief that the Jews of the Diaspora would be saved at the time of the Messiah by the ten lost tribes of Israel, who were awaiting the day when God would send them back from their exile somewhere in the east beyond the fabled Sambation.

In 1892, David Kaufmann noted that the Jewish legend of the Ten Tribes as the future deliverers of Israel was "a faith that was slumbering in the popular [Jewish] consciousness" all through the Middle Ages. The continuing appearance of signs that the Ten Tribes were still waiting for God to let the Sambation dry out, so that they might cross and deliver their brethren in the Diaspora, kept this faith alive. In the letter of Prester John (c. 1165), the Ten Tribes were said to be subjects of the fabled Christian king. This letter was translated into the main European languages, including Hebrew, in which it contributed to maintaining Jewish faith in the advent of the Ten Tribes.

A letter transcribed and preserved by the early fifteenth-century grammarian Joseph ben Jehuda Sarko in his Epistles is reprinted by Kaufmann. This letter is a report of a mission to the papal court of Martin V in 1419. In the month of Nissan, the month of deliverance, the embassy arrived at Rome and the report of a distant Jewish kingdom threw the papal court into a fit of terror. The rumor was so strong and aroused such excitement that two distinguished members of the Jewish community, R. Elias and Benjamin ben Elchanan, set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to bring back whatever information they might find; a letter was sent to the Nagid (the leading representative of the Jewish community) of Egypt, R. Amram, commending the envoys to his care.

Citing letters reprinted in Adolf Neubauer’s Kovets al Yad, Kaufmann claims that "throughout the fifteenth century

---

2. "A Rumour about the Ten Tribes". 505.

Italian Jews sent home from the Holy Land letters teeming with references to the numerous signs that indicated the march of the Ten Tribes. These were sedulously copied and widely disseminated among the communities of Italy."

In the mid-15th century, Abraham of Perugia kept a running account of stories that the Ten Tribes had appeared both in Italy and elsewhere; one even claimed that an army of these tribesmen was deploying near Ancona, the port from which Pius II (r. 1458-1464) planned to launch a crusade against the Turks, and was ready to march on Rome. The apocalyptic propagandist Abraham Halevi ben Eliezer saw in the struggles of the Falasha (Beta Israel) against the Christian kingdom of Ethiopia signs of approaching deliverance for the Jews of the Diaspora." In the fifteenth century, Jewish messianic expectations parallel a larger apocalyptic anxiety, of which Savonarola was but one notable representative."

In 1502, a German Jew called Ascher Lammlein started preaching in Istria, near Venice. He styled himself a

". Kaufmann, "A Rumour about the Ten Tribes. 506.

". The Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 10 (New York, 1943), Article "Tribes, Ten Lost", 304.

". Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, idem.

forerunner of the Messiah. He told the local Jews that if they did penance and undertook ascetic and charitable mitzvoth," the Messiah would appear within six months. The calculation of Isaac Abrabanel (or Abarbanel; 1437-1508) that the messianic age would begin in 1503 and come to fruition within four weeks with the fall of Rome was the immediate background to Lämmlein's preaching, but the atmosphere was ripe. To Graetz, the intense sufferings of these people, many of whom were Spanish and Portuguese exiles, as well as what he calls 'cabbalistic nonsense' were responsible for the Messianic fervor that gripped Italy and Germany in 1502 and 1503." Abraham Halevi ben Eliezer the Elder published his apocalyptic work Mashre kitrin (The Looser of Knots) at Constantinople in 1510."

The history of Jewish messianism and its close association with the much-awaited advent of the fabled Ten Tribes would lead beyond the scope of this study, into both Jewish theology and current events. The goal of this chapter has been to establish the apocalyptic and messianic background

---

"Mitzvoth (plural of mitzvah) are good works commanded in the Law, the performance of which is both necessary and meritorious.

"Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. 1, 43.
against which Christian perceptions of the Jews and of their legendary brethren in the east developed over the period from late antiquity to the high Middle Ages. Much has been omitted, for the sake of brevity as much as for the sake of clarity.
III. ANTI-SEMITISM AND APOCALYPTICISM IN THE MIDDLE AGES

1. Comestor's Conflation: Gog and Magog Meet the Ten Tribes

The Ten Tribes were not always associated with Gog and Magog, nor had they always been understood as apocalyptic destroyers. According to Commodianus (early fourth century), the Ten Tribes were to return under the leadership of Christ the Messiah, conquer the Antichrist, and free Jerusalem. However, in close association with a passage concerning Alexander, Orosius (fifth century) recounts that a great multitude of Jews were deported to the shores of the Caspian Sea, whence someday they will break out. The close association between the Ten Tribes and the peoples enclosed in the area of the Caspian Sea was, therefore, firmly established in patristic precedent. It is no surprise that Roger Bacon

---

1. Commodiani Carmina, Instructionum liber I, ch. xliii, "De populo absconso sancto omnipotentis Christi Dei vivi", CCXCVIII.34-35. See Appendix B, no. 1 for the complete text of this passage.

5. Orosius discusses Alexander's birth, then moves to the 'enclosed Jews'; cited by Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 63:

5. Quibus diebus etiam Alexander Magnus, vere ille gurges miseriarum atque atrocissimaus turbo totius orientis, est natus.

5. Tunc etiam Ochus, qui et Artaxerxes, post transactum in Aegypto maximum diuturnumque bellum plurimos Iudaorum in transmigrationem egit atque in Hyrcania ad Caspium mare habitare praecipit, quos usque in hodiernum diem amplissimis generis sui incrementis consistere atque exim [exinde] quandoque erupturos opinio est. The words in italics are added by Orosius, and do not appear in his sources.
(1214-1292), writing at a time when the identification of these two peoples had become solid "fact" to most contemporaries, cites Orosius' sinister expression, "erupturos" (they will break out), in his Opus Maius: "...and those called Magog, after the prince Gog, their ruler, and the Jews likewise, who Orosius and other saintly authorities say will break out". The identification of the apocalyptic destroyers Gog and Magog with the Ten Tribes of Israel was much stronger in other texts. It was a product of the twelfth century. It first appears in scholastic circles, but owes much to a literary tradition concerned with the place of Christendom in this world more than in the next. A control for the idea that this identification first appeared in the later twelfth century is the Alexander poem by Lamprecht (c. 1130). Here, Gog and Magog are the nations enclosed by Alexander, as in the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius; there is no mention of the Ten Tribes or Jews.

---

'. See Appendix B. no. 11 for the middle High German text and my translation.

'. The same state of affairs obtains in the De imagine mundi of Honorius Augustodunensis (+1130), and in its middle High German derivative called the Lucidarius (12th century): see Appendix B, nos. 9 and 10.
The extraordinary Latin letter purporting to be from Prester John and addressed to various crowned heads of Europe probably was in circulation for some time before 1165, the date mentioned by Alberic of Trois Fontaines in his Chronicle (1232) as the date it first appeared. Ulrich Knefelkamp argues, in agreement with Leonardo Olschki's article of 1931, that the Latin letter was the work of a cleric, possibly a German, and was intended as an utopian model of a peaceful Christian realm of wondrous catholicity, in which all lived

"Der Brief des Priester Johannes", in: Historische Zeitschrift, vol. 144 (1931), 1-14.

Ulrich Knefelkamp's dissertation on Prester John is perhaps the most thorough treatment of the topic to date. Knefelkamp recapitulates the chain of evidence that led to this conclusion in his article "Der Priesterkönig Johannes und sein Reich -- Legende oder Realität?", in: Journal of Medieval History 14 (1988), 337-355; esp. 339-348.
harmoniously. To Olschki, this vision was a political polemic against the disorders and disturbances of the time; it would serve the same function when it was revived in the thirteenth century.\(^\text{10}\) The humility of Prester John at his court was a not very veiled critique of the worldly pomp at western courts both secular and ecclesiastic. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, it was accorded all the credence due documented fact — after all, what evidence was there to disprove the story? Olschki draws some interesting conclusions concerning who believed the story and why:

"One sees that the medieval willingness to believe [such stories] depended neither on the extent of one’s education, nor the scope of one’s experience, neither on class nor on nationality: Popes, Emperors, kings, scholars, clerics, poets and the anonymous audiences of the ballad singers in towns and villages were equally convinced that the story was true."

Poets such as Wolfram von Eschenbach used the story not just as a source of marvelous material, but as an historical document that increased the credibility and power of their narratives.

"As one can see again and again from the sources, the obverse of medieval credulity was a positive sense of the concrete, [a preference for] actual things.\(^\text{11}\)

Such ‘concrete things’ may or may not strike modern observers

\(^{11}\) Olschki, Der Brief, 6.
as credible or reasonable; they may even seem like transparent fictions. The Holy Grail is a good example. Lacking any solid basis in Scripture, this legend about a holy object possessed a popularity and a longevity equalled only by the cults of the more prominent saints. Such concrete things made sense to people who preferred 'actual things'; they were thus 'real', at least subjectively -- whatever we may call them.

In this letter, the Ten Tribes are located in the far east of Prester John's kingdom, among many other wonders, near a sea of sand, beyond a river of stones:

"Beyond the river of stones are the Ten Tribes of the Jews, who, although they pretend they have kings, serve Us and are tributaries of Our Excellency."

---

12. Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 914. The sandy sea is here brought into contact with a river that stands still for part of the week, just as the Sambation was said to do in Jewish lore:

31. Inter cetera, quae mirabiliter in terra nostra contingunt, est harenosum mare sine aqua. Harena enim movetur et tumescit in undas ad similitudinem omnis maris et nunquam est tranquillum. Hoc mare neque navigatio neque alio modo transiri potest, et ideo cuiusmodi terra ultra sit sciri non potest. [...] 32. Tribus dietis longe ab hoc mari sunt montes quidam, ex quibus descendit fluvius lapidum eodem modo sine aqua, et fluit per terram nostram usque ad mare harenosum. 33. Tribus diebus in septimana fluit et labuntur parvi et magni lapides et trahunt secum ligna usque ad mare harenosum...

3. "Ultra fluviium vero lapidum sunt x tribus Iudaeorum, quiquam fingant sibi reges, servi tamen nostri sunt et tributarii excellentiae nostrae." Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 915, 41. Notice the reference to the Christian interpretation of Gen. 49,10 (Jacob's blessing: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come.") disallowing any possibility that Jews might possess the kingly 'sceptre', since the Messiah has already come.
There is no mention in this context of Alexander or mountains in which these Jews might be enclosed. In another passage probably added in the twelfth century, Gog and Magog are enclosed by Alexander. The description is drawn from the tradition of the 'unclean nations' of the Alexander cycle:

"We [sc. Prester John] have other peoples, who eat only the meat both of humans and of brute animals as well as that of aborted fetuses, and who never fear death. And when one of them dies, both his relatives and strangers eat of his flesh with great relish, saying: 'It is a most sacred thing to eat human flesh'. The names of these people are these: Gog and Magog, etc. [...] Young Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia, enclosed these and many other peoples in extremely high mountains in the far north. [...] And this dreadful spawn will come forth before the end of time, at the time of the Antichrist, from the four corners of the earth, and will surround the entire camp of the saints and the great city of Rome [...] No wonder, for their number is like that of the sand which is on the shores of the sea; it is certain that no people, no kingdom, will be able to resist them."^4

That Alexander enclosed both Gog and Magog and the Ten Tribes does not equate these two peoples, but it is a step in that direction; the identification was to follow soon after. When this identification takes place, the foul characteristics ascribed to Gog and Magog in the Letter will be applicable to the Ten Tribes as well.

In the Ten Tribes passage, echoes of the Jewish tradition are unmistakable. Ullendorf and Beckingham have even suggested that the first Hebrew version of the letter, which they argue was addressed to pope Alexander III (reigned 1159-1181), may have been the original, or at least was no mere translation.\textsuperscript{15} The first Hebrew letter also mentions both the enclosed Jews (Ten Tribes) and Gog and Magog, but identifies only the latter as the peoples enclosed by Alexander the Great.\textsuperscript{16} The Latin and Hebrew letters both borrowed details from the highly popular tale of Eldad the Danite.\textsuperscript{17} Like the Hebrew letter of Prester John, the diary of Eldad's travels cites (perhaps inadvertently) Revelation 20,8: "the number of whom is as the sand of the sea", in reference not to Gog and Magog, but to the tribe of Dan: "The tribe of Dan, of the sons of Samson, is numerous as the sand of the sea..." The Sambation is described as a river of stones." It is not unreasonable to suggest that the ancient Jewish tradition of the Ten Tribes influenced both the Latin and the Hebrew letters of Prester John via the tale of Eldad the Danite.

---

^4 Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 311. This passage, taken from the Alexander tradition, is found in manuscripts from the end of the twelfth or early thirteenth century (Zarncke, 393). For the Latin text, see Appendix B.

\textsuperscript{15} Ullendorf and Beckingham, Hebrew Letter, 27-29. The six Hebrew versions are listed thereafter, including the rare 1519 Constantinople print and the abbreviation in Sebastian Münster's Cosmographia universalis, book VI (Basel 1550), 1161-1162.

\textsuperscript{16} "And furthermore we inform you that at the edge of the desert there are men who have two small horns on their forehead, and they have one eye in front and two at the back. And these men are called Peminus [a corruption of Polyphemus] and they eat uncooked meat and they eat flesh and blood [human] and the meat of beasts and animals, and sometimes we wage war against them for they are not Christians and they do not have fear of death; and when their fathers are close to death they slaughter them and eat their flesh uncooked and say that this is an important matter and good flesh which rejoices the heart, and they say that this is for the redemption of their sins. And this nation is called Gog and Magog, and they are the people whom Alexander had locked up, because they are evil-doers and sinners, in the mountains called Gogis (Genghis). And when the Antichrist [...] is born these men will be doing great evil in the world." Ullendorf and Beckingham's translation in Hebrew Letter, 44-45.

\textsuperscript{17} See the English translation by Adolf Neubauer, in his "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 99-104; Eldad's tale is discussed in chapter II.

According to a late twelfth-century middle High German translation of the Latin letter of Prester John, the Ten Tribes are "enclosed", not by Alexander, but by the Sambation: Eldad's story as mediated by the Latin letter here shows the first signs of conflation with the Alexander story. In a much later manuscript in the collection of the Ambras-und-Hofbibliothek, Vienna (cited by Anderson), a work that dates

---

1. Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 100.
2. Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", 102.

3. The Berlin manuscript is from northern Germany, and dates from the end of the twelfth century. It contains the sand sea, as do the Latin and Hebrew letters (Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 951), and the river of stones: "There is a river that flows through there, three days' march in length at one end of my lands, and flows into the same sand (the sand sea): no-one ever saw so big a river flowing. It has not a single drop of water: what flows in it are stones, and great ordinary blocks of wood [...]. I do not know why, but three days in the week, just before daybreak, it stands still: and anyone who wishes can cross it. These same stones that flow there enclose a people of mine, of the Jewish tribes, of whom there is not one who does not serve me." For the German text and my translation, see Appendix B, no. 14.

4. Alexander's Gate, 58.
from the early fourteenth century, the Ten Tribes are described as having been enclosed by Alexander -- as in the majority of works dating from this period. The Munich manuscript, also from the beginning of the fourteenth century, places the Jews beyond a mountain range.

Petrus Comestor (c. 1110 to 1179) was simply drawing

2. Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 956.

3. See below, concerning the Red Jews. The passage in question from the Vienna manuscript translates as follows: Hear what I say: beyond the river of stones, the ten tribes of the Jews are locked up, man, woman and child, by means of a mountain that is wondrous high, who never ever, on no day nor at any time, will come out of their prison, and earthly man never heard anything more of them, whom Alexander in the olden times (marvelously commanding [the mountains] to come together and move apart) locked up alive therein: over which I also rule. They claim to have lords and kings among them; but I am without a doubt lord over them all. They pay me tribute, and I tell you truly, they acknowledge us as lord, when they see our might. For the German text and my translation, see Appendix B, no. 15.

3. Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 999, stanza 41, vv. 437-444: "Beyond the mountain is a Jewish people of considerable cunning: they set up kings among themselves; but I am their lord now. They are two tribes, they must obey me in all their desires, otherwise they will never prosper." (Anderthalb des pirgs ist / ein jüdisch volkch mit maniger list: / die setzen chunig vnder in; / der selben herr ich nu pin. / Zwai [?] geslächt so sind ir, / die müssten mir all mit ir gîr / gar vndertanig wesen, / si möchten anders nicht genesen.)

3. For details concerning the Comestor's (or Manducator's) life and works, see Saralyn R. Daly, "Peter Comestor: Master of Histories", in: Speculum 32 (1957), 62-73. Ignatius Brady, "Peter Manducator and the Oral Teachings of Peter Lombard", in: Antonianum 41 (1966), 454-490. For more recent (and more specialized) studies, see David Luscombe, "Peter Comestor", in: The Bible in the Medieval World: Essays in Memory of Beryl Smalley, ed. Katherine Walsh and Diana Wood the logical conclusion from the tradition of juxtaposition, which started with Orosius, when he -- probably for the first time -- confused or conflated the Gog and Magog tradition (via the Alexander cycle) with that of the Ten Tribes. His magisterial and extremely popular edition of the Bible embellished with stories and legends, the Historia Scholastica, was written between 1169 and 1177. In his lead-(Anderson, Alexander's Gate, notes a variant of the same conflation in the Pantheon of Godfrey of Viterbo (died 1190), a younger contemporary of Petrus Comestor. In Godfrey's version, Alexander shut in two peoples: the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog. Anderson concludes that both versions were based on an older source (69-70); see also Friedrich Pfister, "Zu den deutschen Alexandergeschichten" in: Kleinere Schriften, 228-253, 242-3; and "Alexander der Große in den Offenbarungen der Griechen, Juden, Mohammedaner und Christen", in: Idem, 301-347, 340-341.

---

3. See James H. Morey, "Peter Comestor, Biblical Paraphrase, and the Medieval Popular Bible", in: Speculum 68.1 (1993), 6-35, for a thorough discussion of the popularity, sources and reception of the Historia. Morey notes that the Historia, "one of the most popular books in the late Middle Ages" (3), has received no critical edition or major study and has been neglected in the standard works on scholastic study of the Bible (e.g., Beryl Smalley's The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (3rd ed., Oxford, at the University Press, 1983), which concentrates on Stephen Langton and Peter the Chanter, in the chapter "Masters of the Sacred Page", 196-263), but qualifies this assertion with the information that Comestor's "influence on medieval vernacular religious literature was more significant than either Langton's or Peter the Chanter's" (8). The many early translations into the in to a discussion of Comestor's work, Anderson cites Albertus Magnus (c.1200-1280), who quotes from Comestor, then Orosius and Roger Bacon to show that the Ten Tribes were regarded as 'inclosed nations', and finally credits Comestor with 'consummating' this 'far-reaching change'. Granted, the suggestion that the Ten Tribes of the Hebrew Bible were Gog and Magog of Revelations had been prepared for some time; it was practically built into the structure of Christian exegesis, which generally treated the Hebrew Bible as a veiled foreshadowing of the Christian scriptures. But Comestor made the identification explicit before the time of Albertus or Bacon.

Concerning the Ten Tribes, Comestor altered the tradition of their exile in one important detail: Salmanassar, King of Assyria, placed the 'seven remaining tribes' "by the river Gozan beyond the mountains of the Medes and Persians"

European vernaculars prove the point: a Saxon version, the first of the German Historiated Bibles, was made c. 1248, by order of Heinrich Raspe, landgrave of Thuringia; Jacob van Maerlant produced the Dutch Rijmbijbel in c. 1271; the French Bible historiale of Guyart Desmoulins dates to c. 1295; and Portuguese and Czech translations were made in the fourteenth century (Morey, "Peter Comestor", 3).

3. Without making any determination as to when this apparent consensus appeared; Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 62-64.

Thus, the Biblical passage [II Kings 17,6] underwent a subtle change that brought it more into line with the Alexander legend and the mountains beyond or within which the Macedonian was believed to have enclosed Gog and Magog.

A few chapters later, at the end of his commentary on the book of Esther, Comestor recounted that when Alexander was on campaign in the east, he was approached by representatives of the Ten Tribes, who asked if they might be released from imprisonment in their mountain fastness near the Caspian Sea. When Alexander asked why they were imprisoned, he heard it was for the idolatry committed by their ancestors, who had turned away from the God of Israel and worshipped idols (golden calves). Thereupon Alexander ordered that they be shut up all the more tightly, and begged God to move the mountains together. God granted his request, even though Alexander was a heathen -- suggesting that the cause must have been just. Peter notes that these peoples would break out at the end of time and devastate the world. The purely Jewish tradition of

"... et posuit eos iuxta fluvium Gozan ultra montes Medorum et Persarum." Historia Scholastica, Lib. IV Regum [II Kings], xxvi, PL CXCVIII.1407. See Appendix B, no. 13 for the text of the passage. According to Anderson, Benjamin of Tudela, in his contemporaneous travelogue, writes "the mountains of Gozan and the mountains of Media." (Alexander's Gate, 65, note 1). I have not been able to find this passage in the editions of Benjamin's Travels available to me.

"Historia Scholastica, lib. Esther iv-v: de Alexandro, in PL CXCVIII.1496a-1496c."
the ten lost tribes, based on II Kings and IV Ezra, and familiar to Christians at least through the letter of Prester John, is fitted into the 'Gog-and-Magog-enclosed-by-Alexander' tradition already familiar to Christian readers of the Alexander material; the mountains in the east, which come originally from the Alexander tradition, were implanted in the Biblical passage by Comestor in his rendering of II Kings 17.6, and the two stories suddenly fit together. Christian exegetical and historical literature received this 'new and improved' version of the Ten Tribes story from Peter 'the Eater' and passed it on throughout the Middle Ages. Medieval vernacular letters both secular and religious picked up and developed this theme. Peter's conflation was in no way flattering to the Jews. Even if he had taken the Ten Tribes

2. See especially Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?", for a lengthy and detailed history of the story of the Ten Tribes in Jewish sources from the beginning of the common era to the eighteenth century. See also H. Roth, "Beiträge zu der Alexandersage: Aus einem Brief des Herrn Prof. Roth an Prof. Graf", in: Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft IX (1855) 797-799; esp. 799, and Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 70.

3. See Pfister, "Offenbarungen", 341, esp. note 120. Comestor's conflation found its way into another very popular version of the Alexander story, the Historia de preliis Alexandri magni -- only in a few manuscripts, but in all three recensions. It is a later interpolation from Comestor (Idem, 341).

story from Jewish sources -- and the letter of Prester John is a more likely source -- his identification of the lost Israelites with the peoples enclosed by Alexander (Gog and Magog) was decidedly unfriendly. As we have seen, one of the most popular apocalyptic texts current in Europe from the eighth to the sixteenth century, the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius, ascribed all manner of appalling sins and transgressions to ‘Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander’: unspeakable cruelty and cannibalism, including roasting or boiling pregnant women and eating their fetuses, and dipping swords in fetal blood. These details were included in the

as blaspheming and sacrilegious enemies of Christ] together with the specialization of the Jews in the business of money-lending and the activities associated with it, and with the establishment in most areas of their peculiar juridical status as the possessions -- the serfs -- of the king, was in practice though not in principle the work of the twelfth century." This development in principle Moore situates in the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). However, Peter Comestor foreshadows the identification in principle of Jews (the Ten Tribes) with the forces of ultimate evil.

5. The edition of the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius most usually accessible is that edited by Theodor Mommsen in Monumenta Germaniae Historica. Scriptores. Auctores Antiquissimi XI. Chronica minora saeculorum IV.V.VI.VII., vol. II (1894); Gog and Magog are "gentes immundas et aspectu orribiles" (VIII, 72); they eat "canes, mures, serpentes, morticinorum carnes, aborticia informabilia corpora" (VIII, 73). I have cited from Ernst Sackur’s standard edition in his Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen in Appendix C, no. 2. See also the famous printing of Michael Furter, edited by Sebastian Brant, at Basil in 1498. In this version, the lines cited above are as follows: "gentes immundas et aspectu horribiles" (fol. biiiij', 3); and "canes, mures, serpentes, morticinorum carnes, abortiva infirmabilia corpora" (fol. biiiij', 3).
letter of Prester John, in which the reported cannibalism is called sacratissimum, an especially holy act. The apocalyptic destroyers thus were cast in the worst of all possible lights, partly as a stratagem to frighten unrepentant sinners and lukewarm Christians into mending their ways. Petrus Comestor went one step farther: he equated the Jews of the Ten Tribes with the evil peoples Alexander had enclosed to protect the rest of humanity. 6

A close contemporary of Comestor, Godfrey of Viterbo (1125-1190 or 1202), brought Gog and Magog into close association with the Ten Tribes: Alexander walled up both the former, who are cannibals, and the descendants of the disobedient and idolatrous Israelites, though Godfrey does not identify them with one another. 7

---

7. Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 69, cites a short passage from Godfrey's Pantheon (Chronica) in the edition of Joannes Pistorius Nidanus, Rerum Germanicarum Scriptores II (Ratisbon 'Regensburg', 1731), part XI, 165, cols. 1 and 2. Migne's Patrologia Latina does not contain the relevant passages. The edition available to me was an older print that differs in no significant respect from Nidanus': Pantheon sive Universitatis Libri, qui Chronicci appellantur, xx, Omnes omnium seculorum et gentium, tam sacras quam prophanas historias complectentes (Basel 1559). For a lengthier and more complete selection than Anderson offers, see Appendix B, no. 16. Here are the key passages in English translation: Part XI, 266, line 22: "He saw the people of the Jews, practically hundreds of thousands,
The Comestor, a student of Peter Lombard, continued the Victorine tradition, which M. Grabmann has called a 'Biblical moral school'. With Peter the Chanter (+1197) and Stephen Langton (+1228), the Comestor shared a "common interest in biblical studies and in practical moral questions". Practical moral questions included the vexed issue of usury.

captives of Salmanasar and imprisoned there, who were the spoils of war from Samaria. It is said that Alexander was begged by this people for his help so that they might return to their fatherland. The king, when he saw how things were, was not moved, and said: If God has imprisoned you here for the sins of your people, the orders of God in Heaven are not to be countermanded by me. As God has arranged, so you will remain, he said. [...]"

Line 46: De Goth et Magoth quos Alexander inter montes conclusit. "At the ends of India there was a race of men called Goth and Magoth, called by their surname, concerning them I wish to write little. From other writings you can learn what he knows [?], as told in Isaiah, Isidore, and Revelation. Even the great Sibyll touches on them in her prophecies. This filthy people is accustomed to eating human flesh. They know neither king nor law nor lord nor justice; rules and regulations are nothing to them. [...] The grave of their fathers is their belly, and the ancestral graves are in their bellies. [...] When the world comes to an end, after they come out in strength, then both the New and Old Law will be struck down. Then the strength of the Antichrist will be favorable to them, such that this people will seek to resist the churches of Christ, and will be the sworn enemies of the Christian faithful."

"M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der scholastischen Methode, II (Freiburg, 1911), 467; cited by Beryl Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages, 197. The term 'Victorine' comes from Hugh of St. Victor (+1141), and the abbey of canons regular called St. Victor, founded at Paris in 1110, as a means of reuniting the cloistered life of prayer and the 'active' life of scholarship. Hugh set forth the Victorine program in his Didascaliaon. See Smalley, 83-195.

"M. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages, 197."
To Comestor's contemporary, Peter the Chanter, usurers were prevalent for two reasons: first, because of the support they received from princes and prelates; second, lay usury profited from the protection extended to Jewish money-lenders. This critique came at a truly critical juncture. Since around 1100, the bulk of Jewish professional activity had switched from commerce toward money-lending. Mercantile activity can lead to wealth and envious neighbors, but 'usury', prohibited by canon law, and much more lucrative than the rough slogging of long-distance trade, led quickly to both riches and hatred. Popes and councils had not pronounced on Jewish money-lending until Innocent III protested against it in a letter of 1198 concerning crusaders (Post miserabilem). It was toward the end of the twelfth century that the words 'Jew' and 'usurer'

---

42. Cited by Baldwin, Masters, Princes and Merchants, II, note 16 to chapter XV, 204.
became synonymous, and it was in 1180-82 that Philip Augustus of France arrested and ransomed for enormous sums the Jews of his royal domain. He collected for himself a fifth of accounts owed them, confiscated their land and in 1190, expelled them from the domain -- only to re-admit them in 1198. The theologians of the Chanter's circle protested these heavy-handed methods, claiming rather that the Jews' 'ill-gotten gains' ought to be restored to the 'victims'; however, the atmosphere of hatred for Jews was quite well established.13

The rise of inquisitorial activity under the newly-founded Dominican order extended, at the request of two southern French rabbis, Solomon ben Abraham and Jonah Gerondi, to the burning of Maimonides' works at Montpellier and Paris in 1234. The Dominican Nicholas Donin, a convert from Judaism, persuaded Pope Gregory IX that the Talmud was an immoral book offensive to Christians. The Pope urged the kings and bishops of Christendom to investigate the Talmud, which was seized throughout France by the authority of Saint Louis (Louis IX). A public debate at Paris in 1240 led to the condemnation of the Talmud and the public burning of all copies. The popular Desputaison de la Sainte Eglise et de la Synagogue by the jongleur Clopin, dating from the same period, is a direct echo of the 1240 controversy. Clopin suggested that the Jews were poisoners not merely of the body (as sorcerers and physicians), but of the mind and soul (as scholars and heretics). Clearly, the climate of antisemitism was heating up; religious matters were, as so often, the focal or flash point for Christian aggression.

13. Baldwin, Masters, Princes and Merchants, 298-299.

Comestor's conflation preceded Philip Augustus' harsh policy by a decade. The antisemitic turn taken by events under Philip Augustus and in the following century was foreshadowed in Comestor's amalgamation: via their Israelitish brethren in the east. Jews in general are contaminated by the opprobrium of association with 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander', that is the 'unclean nations'. The flesh-and-blood Jews of western Europe were hardly liked; but the apocalyptic Jews of Comestor's exegetical fantasy were terrifying savages who would do appalling things to Christians as soon as they got a chance. The link between a burgeoning popular and religious antisemitism and the ancient Christian obsession with the Final Things was thus established via the identification of two 'concrete' nations (no matter how 'imaginary' they may seem to us), whose overt similarities (esp. their role at the end of time) seem to have counted for more than their complete lack of association in the Bible. In fact, the contrary opinions of the Church Fathers, especially Jerome and

---

Poliakov, The History of Anti-Semitism, 69-72.
Augustine, were taken into consideration only by certain learned and Latinate clerics; the broad mass of Latin and vernacular works that mention the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog after Comestor's time reproduce his conflation.

Norman Cohn's persuasive argument concerning modern antisemitism, as opposed to the medieval variety, is apposite here, as it adds a crucial psychological perspective to the traditional arguments about economic and social conflict between Christians and Jews:

"As I see it the deadliest kind of anti-semitism, the kind that results in massacres and attempted genocide, has little to do with real conflicts of interest between living people or even with racial prejudice as such. At its heart lies the belief that Jews -- all Jews everywhere -- form a conspiratorial body set on ruining and then dominating the rest of mankind. And this belief is simply a modernized, secularized version of the popular medieval view of the Jews as a league of sorcerers employed by Satan for the spiritual and physical ruination of Christendom."43

However, not only Satan was important in medieval Christian perceptions of the 'Jewish threat'. The Jews of the here-and-now might be charged with conspiring to harm individual Christians, but the Ten Tribes, once they had been assimilated to the apocalyptic nations Gog and Magog, were evidently going to destroy Christendom at the end of time, as players in what was literally the ultimate conspiracy. To people who believed themselves to be living at the end of time, the End and its horrors were not part of a far-off future, but a part of their everyday lives. Not so much a conspiracy as a foregone conclusion, the Jewish role as destroyers doing God's dirty work presents a striking parallel to medieval Christianity's insistence that the Jews were to blame for Jesus' death -- even though his death was also a foregone conclusion, part of God's plan. When contacts between the Jews of Europe and the Jewish destroyers in the East were suggested, as they would be in the thirteenth century by Matthew of Paris\(^4\) and in the fourteenth century,\(^7\) the contamination of European Jewry with the evil of the triply-fictitious 'Ten-Tribes-enclosed-by-Alexander' would be complete.

2. Jewish Cannibalism. Another Hostile Identification

The identification of the Ten Tribes with Goq and Magog provides a new perspective on an unsavory episode in the history of medieval anti-Jewish propaganda, namely the accusation of ritual cannibalism levelled at Jews -- similar to charges of a sacred or even liturgical cannibalism directed at Christians in the second century, Montanists in the fifth, Paulicians in the eighth, the Bogomils in the eleventh, and those burnt as heretics at Orléans in 1022. These accusations reached a watershed in the thirteenth century. Gavin Langmuir has examined the first accusation of ritual cannibalism known to have been aimed at Jews: in 1235 at Fulda. Thirty-four Jews were convicted of this imaginary crime and judicially murdered. He then asks “Since we can now recognize how novel that accusation was, a fascinating question arises: Where did the idea that Jews had committed ritual cannibalism come from?” He suggests that the preaching of Conrad of Marburg ‘had mightily disturbed the minds of Germans at that time’, but concedes:

\(^4\) See below in this chapter.

\(^7\) In Mandeville's Travels and in a fourteenth-century Jahrbuch of Zurich; see Appendix A and chapter IV.

“We cannot, however, say that Conrad himself invented the fantasy of Jewish ritual cannibalism [...]. The simplest explanation, therefore, would seem to be that the accusation against the Jews sprang from the heads of the crusaders or citizens of Fulda who had heard all the horrifying stories about the heretics’ secret rituals and were stimulated by the summons to crusade to project something similar on the worst enemies of Christ, the Jews.”

Langmuir’s provocative thesis concerning the various types of antisemitism is clearly in evidence here. He calls the accusation itself a fantasy; he calls such accusations in a Gavin Langmuir, Toward a Definition of Anti-Semitism, 274.

---

b Antisemitism, 274-281.

c Langmuir, Antisemitism, 277.

d Langmuir, Antisemitism, 277.
general "chimerical fantasies". In the same vein, Langmuir has argued that the most virulent variety of hatred for Jews -- or any other group -- is a projection of unobserved and unprovable characteristics by a dominant group onto a minority. This he calls 'chimeria', and argues that it is essentially the same phenomenon whether it concerns Jews, Turks, heretics, or witches. 'Chimeria' is a neologism that describes threats perceived by those subject to extreme delusions about an outgroup: ritual cannibalism, the blood libel, or National Socialist beliefs concerning the evil and inferior nature of Jews. Langmuir also states in a footnote, in a related work, that "belief in a Jewish conspiracy was present from the very beginning of irrational beliefs about them", but does not allow this insight to function in his analysis of the Fulda case.

The evidence adduced here allows us to suggest an alternative to Langmuir's conclusions and theories. The Fulda accusations of ritual cannibalism were neither novel, nor spontaneous, nor simply an echo of earlier, similarly 'chimeric' charges. This is not to say that the Jews of Fulda practiced cannibalism; on the contrary. But Christians may have had excellent reasons to believe that Jews -- namely the Ten Tribes understood as Gog and Magog -- did. It is impossible to say with certainty whether Comestor's highly influential conflation had reached the clergy and citizens of Fulda, yet such an eventuality would fully explain the charges of ritual cannibalism. The production of a Saxon version of the Historia Scholastica around 1248, in neighboring Thuringia, suggests that Comestor was known in Germany in the early thirteenth century. In the very same year as the incident at Fulda (1235), and not very far away, the Ebstock map of the world depicted the "gentes immundas gog et magog", enclosed by a mountain range and a great wall, eating human body parts that are spurting blood. The caption states that they eat human flesh and drink human blood. Other contemporary evidence from the same cultural and linguistic sphere is furnished by the Saxon Chronicle (Sächsische Weltchronik) of Eike von Repgow, which dates from the early

---

95. Morey, "Peter Comestor", 3.

96. On the mappamundi of the Ebstock cloister (in present-day Lower Saxony), Gog and Magog were described as having been enclosed by Alexander and as eating human flesh and drinking human blood. They are depicted eating human body parts (a lower leg with a foot attached and a severed hand are clearly recognizable). See Leo Bagrow and R.A. Skelton, Die Meister der Kartographie (Berlin, 1973), 315, and Appendix D, no. 1 for a reproduction. The map was destroyed by fire in the second World War.
thirteenth century. Here, the Ten Tribes are identified as the peoples enclosed by Alexander, who will 'come out and commit great slaughter among [Christians]' at the end of time: therefore, they have been identified with Gog and Magog. The Ten Tribes were equated with Gog and Magog in courtly German letters of the early thirteenth century; they were even called 'the Jews'. The same still held true in the 1270s. The Comestorine identification was current, then, at this time in northern Germany; the Ten Tribes were referred to as 'the Jews' in two contemporary vernacular texts. The Letter of Prester John, which had a considerable vogue or revival in the early thirteenth century, reported, as we know, that 'Gog

7. See Appendix B, no. 19, lines 3-15.

8. See Rudolf von Ems' Alexander, which was written between 1220 and the 1250s; Appendix B, no. 21, lines 13038-13045: 'the Jews' enclosed by Alexander are identical with Gog and Magog; they are apocalyptic destroyers; they are called both 'the Ten Tribes' and 'the Jews'.

9. See Ulrich von Eschenbach's Alexander, written between 1271 and 1286; Appendix B, no. 25, lines 20901-20910: Gog and Magog are called 'the Jews'.

10. See Richard Hennig, "Das Neuauflieben der Priester Johannes-Erwartung", 11-21. Hennig cites the letter of Jacques de Vitry, in his capacity as Bishop of Acre, to Pope Honorius, dated 'Sunday after Easter' (18 April), 1221, which identifies the Georgians and their leader 'David' (actually George IV Lascha, who ruled 1212-1223) with the Indians and their ruler Prester John. George had written in 1218 or 1219 to the chancellor of the Principality of Antioch, Galterius, and promised to aid the Christian army then besieging Damietta in its fight against the Saracens. This was the origin of Jacques' report. George was unable to keep his word due to the Mongol wave that rolled over his kingdom under Genghis Khan in and Magog enclosed by Alexander’ believed "the eating of human flesh is a most sacred act" ("sacratissimum est humanam carnem manducare"). Although there is no concrete evidence that the citizens of Fulda identified their Jewish neighbors and victims with the Ten Tribes of the Comestorine conflation, this solution makes the most sense of the belief common in that time and place that Gog and Magog (the Jews of the Apocalypse) eat human flesh, probably for religious reasons. Certainly, the notion of European Jews as cannibals was novel and boded ill for the future.

Nonetheless, similar ideas were common currency; the supposed cannibals posed the greatest threat imaginable to the civilized world. Just as the ‘unclean nations’ had come to be identified with Gog and Magog in earlier centuries, the previous conflation had been identified by this time with the Ten Tribes of Israel. So long as Gog and Magog were depicted as cannibals in Latin sources and in the Alexander novel -- this occurred well into the sixteenth century -- and so long as the Ten Tribes were identified with the destroyers Gog and Magog --until the end of the fifteenth century at least -- 1221; the advent of the Mongols also stirred up rumors that Prester John was on the march -- after all, he was the only one who could have stood up to the nomadic armies --; indeed, Jacques seems to have confused conqueror and conquered as one Christian army. (Hennig, 15). It is ironic that when Jacques wrote to Honorius, Genghis Khan and his armies had already entered Georgia. The next stage in their westward campaign would begin in 1235.

Christians would have ample reason, based on the Alexander story, the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius and the Comestorine tradition, to believe that the Jewish Ten Tribes/Gog and Magog practiced cannibalism, both out of savagery and for religious purposes.

Langmuir suspects that an influential person (probably Conrad) "with a wide perspective, strong -- albeit perverted -- religious concerns and considerable prestige" was behind the extraordinary undertaking to move the bodies of the alleged victims of Fulda 150 miles across the Rhine to Hagenau to show to the Emperor. This is no chimerical fantasy that 'sprang from the heads' of medieval Christians; no "new fantasy [...] created by some people at Fulda in 1235." The Christians of Fulda, seemingly among the first to act on this suspicion, and the Christians who would believe it for many centuries to come, were prepared for such thoughts by centuries of tradition that seeped deeply into the popular, vernacular consciousness -- especially in Germany, as we shall see in the next chapter.

Langmuir's synthesis, which attempts to analyze medieval, early modern and recent forms of anti-Judaic and antisemitic sentiment and belief according to a single set of criteria, suffers from one major shortcoming: by labelling all such beliefs 'irrational' (a descriptive adjective that would not have made much sense to most medieval Christians), Langmuir fails to accord to the intellectual and religious universe of those doing the perceiving any consistent or determinative role. He suggests that pre-programmed, established stereotypes of evil available to contemporary Christians could be pulled off an imaginary shelf at will and applied to Jews, or lepers, or even witches. Far from being irrational fantasies, such projections were built into medieval culture and its worldview: it was internally consistent for the Christian Middle Ages to interpret current events through the filter of biblical, literary and scholastic tradition.

---

Marcel Simon has outlined the history of Christian antisemitism in antiquity, noting that theology set a limit to antisemitism, as Scripture assigned Jews a role and a part to play. He argues that not the real or imagined vices of the Jews, but the vigor and tenacity of their religion elicited hatred. However, the twelfth century seized on the destructive role assigned to the Jews by Christian exegesis as one of the real reasons to hate and fear them. Another way to explain the antisemitic mechanisms at work at Fulda in 1235 is: imagined vices pre-programmed by the Comestorine tradition fed pre-existing hatred and fears. Not real conflicts of interest between living people, to paraphrase Cohn, but beliefs that came very close to positing a demonic Jewish 'conspiracy' of all Jews everywhere to ruin Christianity in spirit and in body were at work in Fulda in 1235.\textsuperscript{45}

3. Variants and Variety. The Ten Tribes in Europe

The Historia Scholastica gave rise to two variants of the enclosure story. The first was popular not only in the German lands, but in all of Europe. Other influential schoolmen, including Hugo Ripelin of Strasbourg (1210-c.1270), repeated this conflation.\textsuperscript{46} Above all, this story would function in relation to events so incomprehensible to European observers that only received apocalyptic categories sufficed to make sense of them.\textsuperscript{47} Matthew of Paris (1200-1259) used the \textsuperscript{45} See his Compendium theologicae veritatis, which reports both a neutral and the prevailing negative interpretation of the role of this people at the end of time:

Appendix B, no. 18. The Compendium is cited incorrectly by Anderson, following the attribution current in his day, as the work of Albertus Magnus (c.1200-1280): Alexander's Gate, 52.

\textsuperscript{46} Cf. the accusations made by Matthew of Paris concerning a 'Jewish conspiracy' to aid the Mongols in 1241, discussed in this chapter, infra.

\textsuperscript{47} See H.M. Schaller, "Endzeit-Erwartungen und Antichrist-Vorstellungen in der Politik des 13. Jahrhunderts", in: M. Kerner, ed., Ideologie und Herrschaft im Mittelalter Historia Scholastica when he derived the origins of the Mongols or Tatars, who invaded Europe in 1240/41 and who he thought would devastate the world at the end of time, from the Ten Tribes, even though he knew the Tatars had no Jewish customs or knowledge. They simply had degenerated from Mosaic Judaism, and were hiding their true nature.

Matthew also recounts a tale according to which European Jewry was overjoyed by the news that the Tatars or Mongols were coming, as they saw in them their long-lost cousins, the Ten Tribes of Israel. He claims that a number of Jews made an attempt to smuggle weapons in great wine-barrels to the Mongols, on the pretext that the Mongols were also Jews and would drink only wine made by Jews. The Jews said the wine was poisoned. However, they were caught and burned. The details are drawn from a tradition of Trojan-horse tales about the smuggling of soldiers and weapons in great wine-barrels, so it is patently false (from our perspective) -- but it would have been entirely credible, because 'well-known', to contemporaries. Matthew's story supports the notion that some contemporary European Jews believed the Mongols to be the Ten Tribes (their saviors), just as Christians believed them to precibus Magni Alexandri quondam inclusit, convenerunt in loco secretissimo". They came together in secret to consult over how best to help the Mongols and damage the Christians. Cohn's argument still holds true; here, the real Jews of Europe are associated with peoples held by them to be the Ten Tribes in an anti-Christian conspiracy. It is not out of place to note that European Jews might well rejoice over the prospect of Mongol government, which did not concern itself with the religious affiliation of subject peoples -- beside the fact that they would naturally welcome an army composed of the Ten Tribes.

(Wege der Forschung, vol. 530; Darmstadt 1982), 303-331.

See Appendix B, no. 20, lines 13-19.

7. These tales are cited by Breßlau, "Juden und Mongolen 1241", 100.

7. Another contemporary source makes the same charge: the annalist of the cloister of Marbach writes in 1222 concerning the rumors reaching the West about the Mongols: "Unum tamen scimus, quod Judaeorum gens super eodem rumore ingenti laetitia exultabant et vehementer sibi applaudebant, nescio quid de futura libertate sua ex hoc provenire sibi sperantes. Unde et regem illius multitudinis filium David appellabant." in: MGH Scriptores XVII [Annales aevi Suevici], ed. Georg Heinrich Pertz (1861), "Annales Marbachenses" for the year 1222, 174; cited from Breßlau, Juden und Mongolen 1241, 100, actes 3 and 4. Breßlau cites Zarncke's explanation of the be Gog and Magog/the Ten Tribes (apocalyptic destroyers). The Jews never confused the Ten Tribes with Gog and Magog. European Jews of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries did not tire of interpreting the latest events as a sign that the Ten Tribes were coming to rescue them from their captivity; in the fourteenth century, the same expectation is attributed to the Jews in the unremittingly popular and much-translated Mandeville's Travels.⁷

Many other observers interpreted what they saw of the Tatars and the snippets of information that reached the west concerning them as signs that the Tatars were indeed the Ten origin of the appellation 'son of David' for the king of the Mongols: in 1221, in a pamphlet designed to encourage the crusaders encamped at Damietta, Jacques de Vitry had called the ruler of India "David rex Indorum". He was supposed to be the great-grandson of Prester John who had great power and would help the Christians. A scribal error in copies sent to the University of Paris and to Duke Leopold of Austria read: "David rex Iudeorum", introducing in a seemingly unimpeachable form the 'news' of the coming appearance in the west of the king of the Jews. (Bre delivery, Juden und Mongolen 1241, 101).

⁷ See Appendix B, no. 30 for the relevant section, taken for convenience of citation and reference from the late-fourteenth-century middle English translation -- which is quite faithful, except for the occasional mistranslation, to the middle French original of Jean d'Outremeuse. There is no modern critical edition of the French original. See the Introduction of P. Hamelius to Mandeville's Travels translated from the French of Jean d'Outremeuse, edited from Ms. Cotton Titus c.XVI, British Museum 2 (London: Oxford University Press, 1923; = Early English Text Society, 154), 13-19.
Tribes, or the unclean peoples enclosed by Alexander. Tales recounting the cannibalism supposedly practised by the Tatars, and accusing them of eating 'frogs, snakes, dogs and unclean animals' as well as the nipples of captured women, circulated widely: here was proof that the invaders were the universally-known 'unclean nations' described in the Revelationes of the Pseudo-Methodius and in the Historia Scholastica of Peter Comestor -- and therefore Gog, Magog and the Ten Tribes. The name of a river in the country of the Tatars was heard as 'Egog' by a Hungarian bishop who interrogated two Tatar prisoners, and through the filters that protected him from the unknown and supplied him with logical possibilities to interpret the unfamiliar, he decided they were of the people 'Gog and Magog'.

3. "Doch kaum glaubt der Bischof 'Gog' zu hören, schiebt sich zwischen die realistischen Fragen und die sachlichen Antworten das Filter des Endzeitdramas, in denen Gog und Magog ihre Rolle spielen. [...] Das Untersuchungsinstrumentarium des
The distortion 'Tartars' for the tribe of the Tha-Ta or 'Tatars', suggested by Frederick II in his appeal to Christendom of 3 July, 1241, was echoed by St. Louis and taken up again by Ricold of Montecroix in his early-fourteenth-century Itinerarium, where he says "l'orrible et merveilleuse gent des Tartares" are similar "aux diablez d'Enfer", and asks whether they are not indeed descended from the Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander, who will come out at the end of the world and do great damage to people and countries.

The apocalyptic and more generally theological filter through which these influential personalities drew their perceptions of the world around them and of secular events is much in evidence here, as is Comestor, one major element of this filter. His influence was such that some of the papal

8. "... vel nos [subject] ipsos [object, to which following clause is in apposition], quos vocamos Tartaros, ad suas Tartareas sedes unde exierunt, retrudemus, vel ipsi nos omnes ad caelum subvehent", reported by Matthew of Paris, Chronica maiora IV, 111; cited by Fried, Auf der Suche, 295, note 35. The syntax of the first subject/object pair "vel nos ipsos" is repeated in chiasmus "vel ipsi nos omnes".
Legates sent to look for the Tatars by Innocent IV carried the Historia Scholastica with them as a guide, in order to compare what they found with the written word of authority: Comestor influenced the way these learned explorers perceived the world."

Yet not everyone swallowed the story whole just because it was in the Historia Scholastica. Vincent of Beauvais (c. 1190-1264) repeats the passage from Comestor almost word-for-word in his Speculum historiale. However, in a subsequent portion of this work, he subjects the story to critical scrutiny and settles on the less-elaborate version retailed by Pseudo-Methodius. The nations Alexander enclosed were not Jews, but 'unclean and horrible' cannibals; neither does Vincent identify these with Gog and Magog." Here, a learned

...Four missions were to look for the Tatars, discover their goals, and gather the sort of information necessary to combat or approach them; they covered the area from Kiev to northern Iraq: Fried, "Auf der Suche", 302-303, esp. note 65.

"The Dominicans who went to Tiflis (Georgia) and Fr. Ascelin all carried the Historia Scholastica (see Vincent of Beauvais, Speculum historiale, Appendix B, no. 24); William of Rubruck took Peter Lombard's Sentence Commentary as far as the Mongol 'capital' Caracorum (Fried, "Auf der Suche", 304 and note 70). These works were part of the scholarly and intellectual arsenal with which these Europeans confronted the realities of Asia.

"Cited by Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 71, Speculum Historiale IV (V), cap. xliii, 42b. Vincent insists that the brothers of his order who visited Georgia and the area near the Caspian asked diligently of all the inhabitants, and all, even the Jews, reported that they had never heard of Alexander enclosing Jews in the mountains; rather, they also had written Christian with a critical attitude has access to sources that seem to clear up the mystery.

The Parisian doctor of theology Hugo a Novo Castro (sometimes called Hugh of Newcastle, but also Hughes de Châteauneuf; fl. c. 1320) repeats Comestor’s story about the Ten Tribes re-enclosed by Alexander, but immediately provides a critique of it. Perhaps in reliance on Hugh of St. Cher (c.1200-c.1263), Hugo a Novo Castro agrees with Augustine sources that related the enclosure of 'quosdam immundos et horribiles' who eat other people and each other. See Appendix B, no. 24 for the text.

Tractatus de victoria Christi contra Antichristum, composed in 1319 (published at Nuremberg in 1471; Hain 8993; Wolfenbüttel Li 4° 193; there are two copies in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris), cap. xi, "de exitu decem tribuum de loco captivitatis eorum" and cap. xii, "de gog et magog". For the Latin text see Appendix B, no. 26. Very little has been written about Hugh, at least in part because not much is known about him. See Ch. V. Langlois, "Hugo de Novocastro or de Castronovo, Frater Minor", in: Essays in Medieval History Presented to Thomas Frederick Tout, ed. A.G. Little and F.N. Powicke (Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1967/1925), 269-275. Langlois lists the extant manuscripts of the Tractatus de victoria Christi contra Antichristum on page 197, note 1, and dates the work to 1319 from the author’s own information, in book ii, cap. 26: "Fluxerunt autem modo, scilicet hoc quo factus est ille libellus, a Nativitate Christi MCC et decem et novem anni." (272). Langlois notes that his colleague Barthélemy Hauréau, in conformity with the then-current opinion concerning apocalyptic thought, called it an "opusculum tout à fait insignifiant, c'est à dire digne du sujet, et plein de billevesées." However, Hauréau approved of and published Hugh’s scathing ‘Memorial on the Sale of Indulgences’ (B.N. MS Lat. 16089).

See his Postillae in Bibliam (Basel: Amerbach, 1504), on Ezekiel 38, fol. 239', F: "Omnis enim multitudo reproborum per eos [Gog et Magog] intellegitur. Vicesimo libro de and Jerome in identifying Gog and Magog not with any one people of a given nation, but as names representative of all the 'perverse nations' that will attack the 'sancti' at the time of the Antichrist. He rejects the idea of "aliqui ... moderni non parve auctoritatis" (some modern authors of no little authority) who think Gog and Magog are the Tatars, or the Ten Tribes: "Illud tamen authenticum fundamentum non habet" -- this story has no solid grounding in fact. Hugo a Novo Castro was thinking of a biblical foundation, which this conflation indeed lacks. Yet he was a child of his time, and like Hugh of St. Cher, he does say that the Ten Tribes, understood either literally or allegorically as Gog and Magog, will come out and join with the 'perverse peoples' who in their turn will afflict the Church of Christ at the end of time, 'just as Methodius prophecies'. These learned commentators, who were well acquainted with the Bible and more concerned with such details than were the courtly civitate dei dicit Augustinus quod dicit Hieronymus. Gog et magog ecclesiam dei persecuturos non sic intellegitur tanquam isti sint aliqui in aliquam parte terrarum barbari constituti: sed per eos malorum universitas intellegitur. [...] Tangit secundum quosdam hic quod predicte due gentes [Gog et Maqog] modo dicuntur incluse sicut et decem tribus: sed tunc exibunt cum antichristo." For the entire passage, see Appendix B, no. 17.

". Hugh, Tractatus, fol. 3', 42 - 8', 5.

". Hugh, Tractatus, fol. 8', 13-17.
littérateurs, rejected the identification of the apocalyptic peoples Gog and Magog with the Ten Tribes or any other 'particular nation'. Their cool erudition, which produced a dispassionate, even scientific view, went unheeded down the ages. Centuries would pass before vernacular letters⁶⁶ -- never mind the common people -- gave up the idea that Alexander enclosed the evil Ten Tribes (who are Gog and Magog) in the 'Caspian Mountains'.

According to Anderson, from the time of Comestor "the reclusion of the tribes of Israel by Alexander had become almost a commonplace in the literature of the Middle Ages".⁶⁷ Anderson cites the influence of Comestor in the works of Vincent of Beauvais and others who wrote in Latin, without mentioning their criticism of Comestor's tale.⁶⁸ Anderson does mention a few vernacular texts from the later Middle Ages that contain the conflation,⁶⁹ but neglects almost entirely the important medieval vernacular tradition that helped to carry the 'Gog and Magog equals the Ten Tribes' conflation into later centuries all over Europe, especially in Germany. Here,

⁶⁶. Even Latin works that referred to this topic would continue to draw on Comestor and ignore Vincent, Hugh and Hugo.

⁶⁹. Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 72, note 1.
a wide variety of textual genres demonstrate the extraordinary hold which the Alexander material had over the historical and literary imagination of the time. In what follows, the most important German transmitters of the story in which Alexander encloses the Ten Tribes (Gog and Magog) will be reviewed briefly in order to establish the indispensable background to the later medieval legend of the Red Jews.

The Saxon Chronicle of Eike von Repgow, written in the first half of the thirteenth century, follows Comestor in identifying the Ten Tribes as the peoples enclosed by Alexander, but does not mention Gog and Magog. The same is true of courtly letters in the early thirteenth century. In the Alexander of Rudolf von Ems (written between 1220 and the 1250s), both Gog and Magog and the Ten Tribes are said to have been enclosed by Alexander, though in different places. Rudolf acknowledges his ancient and Latin sources (Josephus, Rufus Curtius, Augustine, Jerome, Pseudo-Methodius), which helps to explain why he adopts Comestor’s version to the point of having Alexander enclose the Ten Tribes, but not to the point of identifying them with Gog and Magog. By the later thirteenth century, this caution was no longer characteristic of German literature.

In his Alexander, written between 1271 and 1286, Ulrich von Eschenbach equates the Ten Tribes with ‘Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander’ in a passage strongly reminiscent of the Historia Scholastica. He accuses these ‘Jews’ (the Ten Tribes) of the same ‘uncleanness’ as ascribed to the wild peoples by Pseudo-Methodius (gentes immundas), and even calls them ‘children of the Devil’ and ‘horrid evil ones’, a marked parallel to the appellations applied not long before to the Tatars, and again by Ricold de Montecroix a few decades later. These antisemitic portrayals seem to be a combination of 1) a pervasive, ubiquitous and persistent prejudice and hatred and 2) the vile characteristics available from the exegetical and literary traditions, including Ulrich’s main source, the Old French Alexandreis of Walter of Châtillon. In German-language texts, the adjective unrein -- meaning not just unclean but foul and unnatural -- came to be associated with the Ten Tribes and the Red Jews. As R.I. Moore has shown,

7. Alexander, ed. Wendelin Toischer, Tübingen 1888 (=BLVS, 183), 556, v. 209002f. For the middle High German text and an English translation, see Appendix B, no. 25.

8. See Appendix B, no. 25, lines 20909, 20922 and 20939.

Bernard Teyssèdre notes: “La variable, c’est la désignation de l’ennemi, du peuple impie qui est monté du Tartare, qui va déferler sur le monde avec Gog et Magog. Tour à tour il a pris le visage d’Ethiopien, de Sarrazin, de Mongol. Son complice n’a pas changé, c’est le Juif. Race "noire et enténébrée par la malice", disait Origène, voici la Synagogue aux yeux bandés, l’émissaire du Satan more, les dix tribus aux aiguets dans leur prison transcaspienne.” (Le Diable, 286). Teyssèdre lumps all these ‘others’ together as ‘dark’ and ‘marked by the Devil’: and this is doubtless true.

Yet what Teyssèdre misses is that the Ten Tribes are not 'accomplices' of any other demonic people, not since Comestor: to many, they were the apocalyptic people. And as we shall see, these 'Jews' were not generally conceived of (at least in the German-speaking lands) as dark, but as red -- altogether a different negatively-laden colour.

See Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters. Verfasserlexikon, ed. Karl Langosch (Berlin 1953), vol. IV, 572-577, for details of Walter's influence on Ulrich, and for some of the older literature. Comestor's influence is also unmistakable here.

Unraine/unreine meant unclean, evil, unjust, faithless, unchaste; concerning specific sins, it could mean sodomy or bestiality; as a substantive, it meant the Devil. Cf. Matthias Lexer, Mittelhochdeutsches Taschenwörterbuch (Stuttgart 1983)/ Hildesheim 1882), 255. See also Matthias Lexer, Mittelhochdeutsches Handwörterbuch, vol. II (Leipzig 1876), col. 1926: unrein/-e means "nicht rein, eig[entlich] und bildl[ich] (nicht gut, böse, unrecht, treulos, unkeusch)": not clean, actually and figuratively; not good, evil, unjust, faithless, unchaste. In older German, the word unhrénia, unhreini meant immundus, sordidus, inquinatus, "nicht keusch; gemein, gewöhnlich": unclean, filthy, besmirched, unchaste, mean, common: Oskar Schade, Althochdeutsches Wörterbuch, vol. II (Halle 1872-1882/reprint Hildesheim 1969), 1036; and "unheilig, böse, verworfen, verrucht, schändlich, abscheulich": unholy, evil, reprobate, scandalous, shameful, repulsive: Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, vol. XI, section III (Leipzig 1936), col. 1266-1267; the prime example is the old High German expression unhrénia sespilon, an unholy [because heathen] burial party or wake.
a 'language of defilement' was used in the Middle Ages to describe heretical beliefs in terms of disease:

"My suggestion is that, in its small way, the image [of disease] helped puzzled observers, and especially those of a more speculative inclination, to create an explanation of the mysterious and alarming events which they saw, or of which they heard rumors."[9]

The 'language of defilement' combines moral and esthetic categories to express and reproduce in the audience both kinds of revulsion; this symbiosis is common to the use of the traditional term unrevin and to the description of heresy as leprosy, cancer or plague. Moreover, there is a powerful literary authority inherent in the term immundas gentes, which characterized the nations enclosed by Alexander even before they were identified with Gog and Magog. The notion that the Ten Tribes/Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander were 'unclean' (foul and unnatural) was to be central to all future versions of this tale in German letters.

By the end of the thirteenth century, the Ten Tribes were firmly identified with Gog and Magog, via their supposed enclosure by Alexander. The rather crude vernacular rhyming work of Hebrew Bible exegesis known as the Historien der alden written between 1338 and 1345, cites Comestor in two lines, stating only that the Ten Tribes were enclosed by Alexander. The poet Seifrit based his Alexander (finished in 1352), a polished work very different from the preceding, on the Latin Historia de preliis. The nations Alexander encloses are said to be unreich; they will come out of their prison to make war on Christendom with the Antichrist, before the Last Day.

---

The relevant passage in the contemporary, but much more popular compilation known as Mandeville's Travels (c. 1357) demonstrates that the Comestorine story of the Ten Tribes qua Gog and Magog took on a life of its own in the later Middle Ages, and penetrated every corner of Europe. The Jews of the Ten Tribes, whom men call Goth and Magoth were

---

* Ed. Wilhelm Gerhard (Leipzig 1927), 132, vv. 4733-4734: These two lines are part of a very short digression concerning Alexander: "Zen geslechte, daz ist bloz, / Alexander in besloz." (Ten Tribes, that is all, / Alexander enclosed.)

* Seifrits Alexander aus der Strassburger Handschrift, ed. Paul Gereke (Berlin 1932; = Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, 36). For the manuscript tradition and dating, see page v of the introduction. For the passage and a translation, see Appendix B, no. 27.

* "Iewes of x. lynages, that men clepen Goth and Magoth." In the medieval French tradition, Gog and Magog were often called 'Gos et Margos' or 'Goth et Magoth'. See Appendix B, no. 30, lines 3-4.
enclosed in the 'Caspian Mountains' by 'King Alexander' with God's help: "It is said that they shall go out at the time of the Antichrist, and slaughter Christians in great numbers."\(^2\)

For this reason, all Jews that dwell in all countries speak Hebrew, the only language spoken by the Ten Tribes,

"in the hope that when the other Jews go out, they [the Jews of Europe] may understand their language in order to lead them [of Caspia] into Christendom to destroy the Christians. For the Jews say that they know well by their prophecies that the Jews of Caspia will go out and spread throughout the entire world, and that Christians will be subject to them for as long as the Jews have been subject to the Christians."\(^3\)

This is a conspiracy theory of the first order; the only reason the 'real' Jews learn Hebrew is to communicate with their apocalyptic confederates from the East for the purpose of destroying Christendom.

Comestor's conflation made its way into the French Alexander novel as well. As late as the early fifteenth century, a vernacular French Alexander depicted the Ten Tribes as having been enclosed in the Caspian Mountains by

\(^2\) Mandeville’s Travels, 193, 19-21: "... men seyn thei schulle gon out in the tyme of Antecrist, and that thei schulle maken gret slaughter of Cristene men."

\(^3\) Mandeville’s Travels, 193, 22-28; Appendix B, no. 30. Here is a clear example of the sort of conspiracy for the domination of Christendom already being imputed to the Jews and their Asiatic cousins in the fourteenth century.
The middle Low German and middle High German Historienbibeln (Historiated Bibles) of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries served to recount biblical history to the laity in the same way as one of their principal sources, the Historia Scholastica, did for the learned. The Alexander section in the Historiated Bible I, as in the middle Dutch sielen trost (1370) and the other Historiated Bibles, follows the Historia Scholastica closely.

This first variant of the Comestor tradition was common to all of Europe, including Germany. It is represented in Latin and vernacular versions. The Ten Tribes were held, by

---

104. See the Legende d’Alexandre after Jacques van Maerlant, 1431, in the Royal Library, Brussels, 9018-9, esp. fol. 7.

105. For this episode in the middle High German Historiated Bibles, see Theodor Merzdorf, Die deutschen Historienbibeln des Mittelalters nach vierzig Handschriften (Tübingen 1870; = Bibliothek des Litterarischen Vereins in Stuttgart, C-CI); Historienbibel I, C, 551-552; Historienbibel IIb, C, 71; Historienbibel III, C, 37. The source of the episode in the middle Low German Historiated Bibles was the middle Low German Seelentrost of 1380: see the edition of Margarete Schmitt, Der Große Seelentrost. Ein niederdeutsches Erbauungsbuch des vierzehnten Jahrhunderts (Cologne/Graz, 1959). See also D.J.A. Ross, Illustrated Medieval Alexander-Books in Germany and the Netherlands. A study in comparative iconography (Cambridge, at the University Press, 1971) and H. Vollmer, Ober- und Mitteldeutsche Historienbibeln in Materialien zur Bibelgeschichte und religiösen Volkskunde des Mittelalters, vols. I-IV (Berlin 1912-29).

106. See Appendix B, no. 29 for text and translation.
the thirteenth century, to have been enclosed -- or rather, re-enclosed -- by Alexander the Great. This confusion bred more confusion, namely that the Ten Tribes were Gog and Magog, the people ‘originally’ (sic) enclosed by Alexander. This tradition would function throughout the Middle Ages in the Alexander material, in commentary on the Ten Tribes, and in apocalyptic contexts. Parallel to this conflation, the story of Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander, itself the product of a previous conflation, continued to be influential and to find expression in both Latin and vernacular texts (e.g., in later manuscripts and early printings of the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius.

Where the Ten Tribes are assumed to be Gog and Magog (because enclosed by Alexander), antisemitic attitudes coincide with apocalyptic traditions. In Mandeville’s Travels, the Jews of Europe are charged with a conspiratorial perfidy that relates directly to the apocalyptic role of ‘the Jews of the Ten Tribes whom men call Goth and Maqoth’. The many German translations of Mandeville’s Travels, especially in the fifteenth century, bear witness to its immense influence on the Continent. Evidence adduced in the next chapter shows that the Jews of Europe were believed to be in contact with the Red Jews for the purpose of causing the Black Death. The belief betrayed by Matthew of Paris in the link between the Jews of Europe and the Ten Tribes was not an isolated scholarly quirk.
The result is a composite antisemitic (not anti-Judaic!) apocalypticism based on a willingness to ascribe to Jews -- whether real Jews or the fabled Ten Tribes, who are believed to be in league and in contact with each other -- the worst possible motives in the here and now and the worst possible role at the end of time. Far from 'chimeric fantasies', accusations both of cannibalism and of evil designs on Christendom are part of a larger context of antisemitic and apocalyptic propaganda that finds manifold expression in vernacular texts, far from the critical eye of trained scholars. Here, the Jews are both an immediate and an apocalyptic threat to Christendom; they are in league with the Devil and with the Antichrist.
IV: THE RED JEWS IN THEIR 'NATIVE HABITAT'

Stories about the Ten Tribes, Gog and Magog and 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' were handed down throughout the Middle Ages both in their original contexts (Jewish, Biblical, literary) and in the relatively 'new' tradition of Comestor's conflation. Generally, no clear distinction was made between, say, the Comestorine version and that of Pseudo-Methodius or the Bible -- except by certain critical scholars, such as Hugh of Novo Castro or Vincent of Beauvais. In vernacular letters, such distinctions as were made in the early thirteenth century between 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' and 'the Ten Tribes (re-) enclosed by Alexander' (e.g., the Saxon Chronicle) soon disappeared. Our task is to unravel strands that generally were not perceived or understood as separate; in so doing, we will inevitably distort the mental world of those who used these 'strands' in their work. A magnifying glass not only picks out discrete parts of the whole, it distorts them as well. With that caution in mind, and with the knowledge that the Revelationes of the Pseudo-Methodius and the Historia de preliis of the Archipresbyter Leo were in abundant circulation throughout the Middle Ages and beyond, presenting alternative visions of Gog and Magog, Alexander, the Ten Tribes and the End of Time, we are well-equipped for the dissecting work that should yield, at the end, not merely the several joints and empty carcasses of our texts, but a larger, better focused and more integrated -- albeit synthetic and highly selective -- picture of the meaning and role of the Red Jews in medieval society than was available to contemporaries.

Enough evidence concerning the links supposed by Christians to exist between the apocalyptic Ten Tribes and the hated Jews of Europe has been adduced in the previous chapter to prove there was an intimate connection between antisemitism and apocalyptic expectation as early as the twelfth century.

The first tradition to come out of Comestor’s conflation was an important carrier of ethnic and apocalyptic Jew-hatred. Unlike Aristotèle, who was ‘baptized’ by scholastic thinkers, the Ten Tribes were anathematized in Christian sources both Latin and vernacular as Gog and Magog, the evil, cannibalistic destroyers.

The second tradition engendered by Comestor’s conflation was a German variant of the Ten Tribes legend. The Red Jews are, in a sense, the Ten Tribes; like the Ten Tribes, they are generally identified with Gog and Magog, and they are characterized as unrein (foul), savage and deceitful.

In the German literary and exegetical traditions, Comestor’s ‘conflated peoples’ are called the Red Jews, especially in vernacular sources that are at some remove from learned discourse and expert knowledge of the Bible. ‘Red Jews’ is the term used in many, perhaps even most Germanlanguage treatments of the topic from the late twelfth to the late sixteenth century.¹ In the fifteenth century, the cresting wave of popular apocalypticism that appears most clearly in the German Antichrist book used the term Red Jews to describe the apocalyptic Asiatic associates of the Antichrist.² In this vernacular work, the idea of the Ten Tribes and the image of Gog and Magog have been smelted into a particularly German alloy, leaving little room for the biblically-based critique of the medieval commentators. These Antichrist books draw on the vernacular tradition characteristic of the typical German reception of Comestor's conflation.

1. The Middle Ages See Red: The Moral View

Medieval Christianity was not favorably disposed to any Jews, except perhaps Jesus and the prophets -- if they were recognized as Jews. Where does the color 'red' fit in? Ruth

¹. This is an estimate based on my assessment of the sources; an exhaustive listing of all the relevant passages and a corresponding statistical breakdown is an appealing prospect but beyond the scope of the present study.

². A hodge-podge of Sibylline prophecy, the Alexander story, and popular exegesis of biblical passages based in part on Hugo Ripelin's thirteenth-century Compendium theologicae veritatis, the Antichrist book was a major player -- alongside Passion Plays and other popular theatrical genres -- in anti-Semitic apocalyptic expectation all through the fifteenth century. See the brief discussion toward the end of this chapter. See chapter V for a more extended treatment of the Antichrist book in context.
Mellinkoff has shown that a deep-seated prejudice against red hair ran like a thread of the same color through ancient and medieval culture. People with red hair were thought to be "false, dangerous, tricky, shameless, over-sexed, deceitful, hot-tempered, unfaithful, foolish, war-like, crude, vulgar, low-class and unlucky for those who meet them." Not surprisingly Judas was often portrayed in medieval religious art as having red hair. The Grimm brothers report that in medieval Germany, red hair and a red beard were signs of a false and duplicitous nature; a 'red man' ("ein roter") was a man with red hair and a red beard. Verse 2842 of the poem Wigalois reports that it is said of men with red hair and beard that their heart is wicked.

In middle High German, rot (red) had an important

---

1. Red-heads are a minority in all societies and ethnic groups, and minority features, like minorities, are suspect, she argues. "Judas's Red Hair and the Jews", in: Journal of Jewish Art 9 (1982), 31-46.

2. Mellinkoff, Judas, 32.

4. Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, 1296:
"im was der bart und daz har beidiu rot, viurvar.
von den selben hoere ich sagen daz si valschiu herze tragen."
secondary meaning: duplicitous, wicked, faithless, cunning.

The name given to the language of beggars and thieves, Rotwelsch, reflects the notion of falseness. According to Friedrich Kluge, the element 'welsch' in 'Rotwelsch' refers to a Latinic, therefore incomprehensible, language, and 'rot' to falseness, wickedness, faithlessness; the term 'rotwalsch' appears as early as 1250 in the figurative sense of words with a secret or sinister meaning. Therefore, the word 'Rotwelsch' dates from about the same time as the first use of the term Red Jews: this is one possible, even probable, model for its construction. The history of German usage leads us to the conclusion that the 'Red Jews' were in physical terms Jews who bore the mark of red hair and red beards — because they were morally degenerate. As it happens, the sources support this.

---

1. Kluge, Etymologisches Wörterbuch der deutschen Sprache, Berlin/New York, 1989[2], 606. Siegmund A. Wolf also notes in his Wörterbuch des Rotwelschen. Deutsche Gaunersprache (Mannheim, 1956) that 'rot' had in medieval German the secondary meaning "falsch, ungetreu" (duplicitous, faithless), and that Pamphilus Gengenbach, in his treatment of Rotwelsch, sometimes calls the language of the fraudulent beggars simply "rot" instead of 'rotwelsch', to emphasize the dishonest nature of this way of speaking (270).

2. Wolf, Wörterbuch des Rotwelschen, 270.
conclusion.

Jews often were portrayed by medieval illustrations in Christian texts with red hair and in red clothes. Thérèse and Mendel Metzger even note in their book on the illuminations in medieval Hebrew manuscripts that in 1360, the Jewish men of Rome were required to wear a short red tabard, and Jewish women a red skirt. There is less definite though quite suggestive evidence to be culled from the illustrations of medieval Hebrew manuscripts reproduced in color by the Metzgers. At least half these illustrations represent Jews, female and male, with red hair or red hair and beard, or red hair and red clothes, or simply in red clothes. There seems to have been a particular link between Jews and the color red in hair. This is a connection so widely-accepted as to be included prominently in illustrations of Hebrew manuscripts, though in such cases, these depictions presumably lacked or did not evoke the negative associations generally marked by red hair. The Jews by whom these manuscripts were made and for whom they were intended seem to have attached no negative

---

7. In similar fashion, Jewish folklore would later adopt the German term 'Red Jews' as a name for the Ten Tribes of Jewish legend, without adopting the hostile associations that produced and sustained the legend in Christian Germany.
significance to the color red. Yet as we have seen, Christian iconography 'saw red' in connection with Judas. The Metzgers' manuscript illuminations suggest that to Jews as to Christians, Jews were typically red-headed and wore red clothes; it was taken for granted. The Metzgers were concerned with other topics, but it is remarkable that they do not comment on this colorful attribute.

Besides sometimes being assimilated to purple, the color of royalty, red symbolized sin or sinfulness among medieval Jews as well as Christians. In the Leipzig Machsor, which dates to the second or third decade of the 14th century, a red elephant is depicted at the foot of a page of text, between two dragons. Schreiner notes that although the symbolic significance of the other animals is clear, the

---

1. See also the discussion in chapter VI of the pamphlet "Die geschichte und bekanntnuß des getauften Juden/genannt Johannes Pfefferkorn" (1514/15) Landesbibliothek Stuttgart, HBK 142, a polemical broadside aimed from the Reuchlin camp at the Cologne 'Obscure Men' and their 'tame Jew' Pfefferkorn. Of a number of children who were to be murdered to obtain their blood, the supposed 'Pfefferkorn' says under torture that one with red hair was allowed to go free - presumably because he was a Jew. Again, this proves that contemporary Christians associated red hair with Jewishness.

3. Das Lied der Lieder, Schreiner, ill. 28 (codex: fol. 174r).
meaning of the red elephant is not. He surmises that the elephant refers to a Talmud passage in which a particular school (Pumbeditha, in Babylon) is criticized as lax and over-subtle to the point of duplicitousness: "You are probably from Pumbeditha, those who would let an elephant pass through the eye of a needle". Red symbolizes sin, and the red elephant warns the sinner to make amends: otherwise he will not be allowed through the gates of heaven, just as 'an elephant cannot pass through the eye of a needle'.

In the Donaueschingen Passion Play of the later 15th century, "the Jews" (i.e., the stage Jews caricatured by Christian actors), depicted in the worst possible light as blasphemers of Jesus, accuse Jesus of having a red beard, just like the traitor Judas. This was apparently the worst possible attribute that contemporary German Christians could impute to a despised person.

Hitherto overlooked persuasive pictorial evidence establishes a firm connection between Jews, particularly the

---

6. The Babylonian Talmud, Baba Mezia [Metsia], ed. Rabbi Isidore Epstein, trans. H. Freedman (London: The Soncino Press, 1935), 38b: "Perhaps you are from Pumbeditha, he retorted, where they draw an elephant through the eye of a needle." Freedman's note is that the scholars of Pumbeditha were 'extremely subtle'. Schreiner, Das Lied der Lieder, 107-108.

legendary Ten Tribes, and the color red in a 15th century manuscript Historiated Bible. Only the Jews, who are here the Ten Tribes, have red hair and beards; Alexander and his men have fair hair and beards. The universally-suspected minority characteristic of red hair was used in Christian iconography and texts to create a pejorative designation for a despised minority group, an effective way to label evil and devalue those thus marked. Until the late fifteenth century, the 'Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander' typically appear under the name Red Jews in German-language apocalyptic. However, over the course of the first half of the sixteenth century, the term Red Jews is increasingly applied to the Biblical Ten Tribes, though Alexander’s role never entirely disappears. These exotic eastern Jews later come to be represented as allies of the Christians against the Turks, not as apocalyptic destroyers.

2. The Textual Tradition

So far as my research has been able to uncover, only

---

* A number of Historiated Bibles survive in fifteenth-century mss. Some contain depictions of the enclosing of the ten lost tribes by Alexander. In one of these, in the Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin - Preussischer Kulturbesitz, (Ms. germ. 2° 565, fol. 531'), these Jews have red hair and beards, despite the fact that the term 'Red Jews' does not appear in the text. As in the medieval Hebrew mss. reproduced by the Metzgers, Jews are depicted with red hair. It is especially apposite that these Jews have red hair. See Appendix D, no. 3.
German-language texts use the term Red Jews. In Mandeville’s Travels, the Ten Tribes are referred to as "the other Jews" and "they of Caspye"; there is no special name for them. They are Jews. Here we find a number of clues concerning the use of the term Red Jews as opposed to ‘Jews’: only where Jews were present in everyday life would there be any need for a distinction between Jews (whom one sees) and, say, Asiatic Red Jews (whom one does not see). Many medieval authors in the German-speaking lands made just such a distinction. Where there were no or very few real Jews with whom to confuse them, the Ten Tribes could simply be called Jews. After the expulsions from England and France in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, it is precisely in the German-speaking lands that Jews were to be found.

* I include here, as dependent on the German vernacular tradition, the reference in the middle Low German sielen trost (1370), and the middle Swedish Konung Alexander (1380), a translation from Latin that uses the vernacular term (borrowed from German) to describe the cannibalistic Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander.

* The Ten Tribes are never called Red Jews in any of the versions of Mandeville’s Travels. Illustrated fifteenth-century German manuscripts of Monteilles/Mandevilles Reise depict the Ten Tribes shut up in the mountains (see Safran, The Iconography of Antisemitism, 27 and plate 56, from Stuttgart Landesbibliothek, theol. 195, fol. 177; and plate 57, from the same collection, Cod. poet. 4, fol. 69). However, printed versions of Monteille show only two Jews engaged in discussion with the Queen of the Amazons: e.g., Safran, plate 58, from B. Richel’s Monteil (Basel, 1481), and plate 59, from B. Kistler’s Monteil (Strasbourg, 1490s).
The Red Jews are first mentioned in Der Jüngere Titurel, a late-thirteenth-century continuation of Wolfram's Titurel fragment. The continuator calls himself Albrecht, and has generally been identified with Albrecht von Scharfenberg. A long and florid work interrupted by frequent moral and courtly lessons, this continuation can be assigned by internal evidence to the 1270s. It was considered in the

---

1. Der Jüngere Titurel, ed. K.A. Hahn (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1842; =Bibliothek der gesammten deutschen National-Literatur, 24), 596, v.6057 ff. There is a more recent edition in a selection of passages by Werner Wolf (Berne, 1978; = Altdeutsche Übungstexte, 14), strophes 6124-6127. This immensely popular tale was printed in 1477 (Hain 6683; Wolfenbüttel 275.8 Hist.2”). Wolf’s text depends as much on the 1477 text as on Hahn’s edition of manuscript sources.

2. c. 1170-c.1220.

4. Werner Schröder, Wolfram-Nachfolge im Jüngeren Titurel. Devotion oder Arroganz (Frankfurt a/M, 1982), 28-33; see also the Jüngere Titurel, 1172A, 4f. It is of interest here that Christians started to accuse Jews of host desecration at about this time: Langmuir corrects Leon Poliakov, Du Christ aux Juifs de cour (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 1955; = vol. I of his monumental Histoire de l’antisémitisme), 75 and R.I. Moore, Persecuting Society, 38, who assume that such accusations occurred in earlier sources (for Cologne in 1150 and Belitz in 1263). In fact, these accusations were introduced into their accounts by later chroniclers to whom such charges were current. Langmuir, "From Anti-Judaism to Antisemitism", 100, note 27. In the escalation of antisemitic sentiment and belief, the characterization of the ‘Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander’ as Red Jews in the thirteenth century was a significant contribution to the stigmatization and dehumanization of Jews in general.
fourteenth century to be the main work of Wolfram himself. It was highly prized in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as a treasure-trove of practical lessons concerning the best German literary style, courtly behavior and moral principles. The Younger Titurel does not mention Alexander, and it is hard to tell if Albrecht used the Historia Scholastica. But in his tour of the eastern Asiatic kingdom of Prester John, he encounters the Red Jews, enclosed between two mountains called Gog and Magog (named after 'two peoples'). These Red Jews are numerous; they are 'keen fighters and savage', and their large armies could swarm across 'the whole world'; they threaten both Christians and the barbarous 'heathen'. They are enclosed 'so that they cannot march war-like and proud across the earth'.

---

6. The Grail is being taken from the corrupt West to the pious kingdom of Prester John.

7. Anderson also 'smells' Alexander, noting the similarity between these two mountains and the ubera aquilonis, or Boreum and Promuntorium, the names for the mountains between which Alexander enclosed Gog and Magog in the pre-conflation tradition: Alexander’s Gate, 68-69.

3. "ir meng"; see Appendix A, no. 1, line 6125.

6. "snél und wild ir meng übr al die welte. / kristen unde heiden war ein niht gen in zu wider gelte." See Appendix A, no. 1, line 6125.

6. "daz si niht sint uf erden progende varnde." See Appendix A, no. 1, line 6124.
this reason that the enclosing mountains are so high, higher even than the rainbow. These Red Jews are primarily a secular, military threat; Alexander and the Ten Tribes are not mentioned. There is not even a hint of the role to be played by the (Red) Jews at the end of time: the eschatological dimension of Comestor's conflation is missing. However, the details of the Red Jews' mountainous prison and of the wild river that encircles them are clear signs of dependence on both the Alexander legend and the Jewish legend of the Sabbath, mediated (in all likelihood) by the letter of Prester John. All the attendant details suggest that Comestor's conflation was the ultimate source of this episode. However, the final product, a secular vision of horror based on the military threat posed by the Red Jews, was a long way from the Parisian school-master's surmise.

The Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg, which dates from the end of the thirteenth century,\textsuperscript{1} betrays absolutely no reliance on the story of the Ten Tribes. Rather, it mobilizes the well-known Red Jews -- a wild and warlike people\textsuperscript{2} -- and \textsuperscript{1} Ed. Alfred Koppitz (Berlin 1926; = Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, XXIX); cited by Birkhan, "Die Juden in der deutschen Literatur des Mittelalters", 149-150. See Appendix A, no. 2 for text and translation.

---

\textsuperscript{2} These Red Jews are quite possibly borrowed from the Younger Titurel. Koppitz notes the strong influence of the latter and of Wolfram's work in general on the Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg: Trojanerkrieg, XXII.
parachutes them into a curious medieval version of the Iliad. Hercules and Ulysses, here described as cowardly, are searching for Achilles. On their journey, they encounter a foul and unnatural (unrain) people, the Red Jews, with whom they fight for twelve days, leaving dead 'many a strong Red Jew' and killing a total of 20,000 of the 'red folk'. This portrait of the Red Jews is again most 'secular' -- there is no mention of either the Ten Tribes or Gog and Magog, nor of any eschatologically threatening role to be played by the (Red) Jews. Even so, it is one of the most hateful of such portraits: the emphasis is on the Red Jews' exceedingly foul nature, their savagery as warriors and their appearance, which causes a physical reaction in those who see them up close. The remaining Red Jews flee into the mountains. Alexander appears only at the end of the episode as the good king who, many years later, would defeat their descendants. A faint echo of Comestor can be discerned.

It is worth noting the narrative mechanism at work here: a medieval legend stripped of its original and overt religious connotations is projected into Greek antiquity as the background to one of the legends from which it was itself 'descended'. When a legend or an idea becomes its own source, it must be a firmly rooted and autonomous entity in the minds of those who know and use it. We can deduce that the author of the Trojanerkrieg associated the Red Jews with Alexander, but in no necessary or causal way. Rather, the Red Jews, an evil and unnatural people in the east, interact with figures equally real to the medieval view of the world: the heroes of the Iliad and Alexander the Great.

---

1. See the discussion in chapter III.

It must also be remembered that these people are Jews. Contrary to the assertion of Helmut Birkhan that this depiction of the 'Red Jews' was not a denigration of Jews in general,⁴ ever since Comestor's time, the insertion of Jews into the boots of the foul and cannibalistic nations called Gog and Magog was a systematic and calculated denigration. As a matter of fact, it was a demonization of the Jews thus described and, by extension, of Jews in general -- as discussed in the previous chapter. When seen in the context of Comestor's conflation and of the role that would be ascribed to the Red Jews as servants of the Antichrist, this depiction of the Red Jews is not anti-Judaic,⁵ but anti-(rubro)Semitic: the Red Jews are pilloried as an evil-looking, foul and unnatural people. In modern depictions of foreign peoples, American anti-Japanese propaganda of the second World War, or

---

⁴. "Die Juden in ihrer mittelalterlichen Umwelt", 150: "Eine Abwertung der Juden schlechthin, ist hier noch nicht deutlich."

⁵. That is, not in the sense of antagonism toward the Jewish religion.
Tolkien’s orcs, come close -- very close. A subliminal racism, or at least xenophobia, that associates foreign features (eyes, skin, hair color, customs) with evil is at work in both instances.

Just after 1300, Heinrich von Neustadt wrote a history of salvation called Von Gottes Zukunft, in which he places the Red Jews, Gog and Magog and the Queen of the Amazons together in ‘Caspia, the enclosed land’ as future servants of the Antichrist. Here, the Red Jews are clearly the Ten-Tribes-enclosed-by-Alexander; Gog and Magog are enclosed with them, separately. The last detail is the only major difference that distinguishes the Von Gottes Zukunft from the line which can be traced through the middle High German Passau Anonymous (c. 1330) and the fifteenth-century Antichrist books. This

---

This detail probably comes from the Compendium theologicae veritatis of the Strasbourg Dominican Hugo Ripelin (1210-1268/70), also known as Hugh of Strasbourg, cited here in the version provided by Jacobs and Ukert, Beiträge zur älteren Litteratur, 118: "De Gog et Magog dicit quidam, quod sunt decem tribus intra montes Caspios clause, non ita tamen, quin exire possent, si permitterentur; sed non permittentur a regina Amazonum, sub cuius regio et ditione vivunt." (Compend. theol. ver., VII.11.138 (see the full passage, in a slightly different version, in Appendix B, no. 18, lines 2-5): "Concerning Gog and Magog some say that they are the Ten Tribes enclosed within the Caspian Mountains, however in such a way that they might leave if they were permitted; but they are not permitted to do so by the Queen of the Amazons, under whose rule and jurisdiction they live."

---

7. Ed. S. Singer (Dublin/Zurich 19671), 5548-5553. For the text and an English translation see Appendix A, no. 3.
tradition identified the Red Jews with Gog and Magog (based on Hugo Ripelin's identification of the Ten Tribes with Gog and Magog), and placed them under the tutelage or in the companionship of the Queen of the Amazons.

The middle High German Maccabäerbuch, a work of vernacular exegesis, was written before 1335, probably by the Teutonic Knight Ludger of Braunschweig. As with Heinrich of Neustadt, the Red Jews are identified with the Ten Tribes, but not with Gog and Magog, who are a separate people. Ludger explains that the Red Jews/Ten Tribes are enclosed because their ancestors worshipped idols — golden calves; citing II Kings 17,5-6 and 17,15-16 -- and were carried off into captivity by the king of the Assyrians. Here, more precise reference to the Bible and a sharp distinction between the sinful Ten Tribes and the apocalyptic peoples Gog and Magog differentiate the work of this cleric from the secular interpretations of the Trojanerkrieg. Yet, as in Heinrich's Von Gottes Zukunft, the Red Jews/Ten Tribes have been assigned

---

9. Das Buch der Maccabäer in mitteldeutscher Bearbeitung, ed. Karl Helm, Tübingen 1904 (=BLVS, 233), lxxxviii; 23, v. 789f; Verfasserlexikon 10, 11. See Appendix A, no. 5 for text and translation.

10. See Appendix I, German text: 793-802; translation: "In these mountains were the ten great hordes of the Jews captive and enslaved, they could not come out. They were the ten tribes, the true Israelites. They are also called the Red Jews. They are those with whom Gog and Magog will break out in the last days."
a part in the final drama as associates of Gog and Magog. In these two works, the Red Jews are not foul and unnatural in reference to this-worldly existence, they are supremely dangerous with reference to the end of this world. Although he repeats with some elaboration Comestor's description of the enclosure by Alexander, Ludger is no stuffy schoolmaster. He is present enough in the here-and-now to offer an explanation for the already-traditional term Red Jews: their "rote" [modern German "Röte"] or redness was due to their lasting shame at [their ancestors'] having repudiated the God of Israel and worshipped idols in the form of golden calves.

The middle High German version of the Passau Anonymous" (ca. 1330) identifies the destroyers Gog and Magog as "Jews, who are called the Red Jews". The original Latin (1260/66) contains only the traditional story of Gog and Magog, without identifying the destroyers with the Ten Tribes as many sources would do all over Europe, and more pertinently without

---

"It is worth noting that this sin is made to apply to "present-day" Red Jews in the same way that the supposed killing of Christ was laid at the feet of all Jews; perhaps this latter phenomenon served as a judicial model.

"Vom Antichrist. Eine mittelhochdeutsche Bearbeitung des Passauer Anonymus, ed. Paul-Gerhard Völker (Munich 1970; = Kleine deutsche Prosadenkmäler des Mittelalters, vol. 5). For the relevant passage and a translation, see Appendix A, no. 4."
applying the German appellation "Red Jews". To the author of the vernacular adaptation, Gog and Magog meant none other than "Jews, who are called the Red Jews". What the term means seems unclear to the author, since he qualifies its use with the phrase "who are called" -- the very words of Ludger. The name is traditional, fixed; the Jewishness of this people is in the foreground of the text. There is enough detail for us to pinpoint some of the sources: in all likelihood, the letter of Prester John is behind the description of the Sambation and the land of the Red Jews. The Red Jews will attack Christendom together with the Antichrist, leading many other 'apocalyptic' peoples -- who are called, like Gog and Magog in Rev. 20, "as numerous as the sand of the sea, as the angel told John". Their names are drawn from the world-view of medieval Europe and from Ezekiel 38-39: 'the evil Spaniards [Moors]', 'those from Persia, from Lybia, from the land of the Moors [mostly Moslems], from Dogorma' and Gomorrah [the destroyed city], from Dacia [pagans], from Sardinia and from Carthage [Moslems again] as well as many other unbaptized peoples.' The traditional religious and political medieval Feindbild "juden-ketzer-heiden" fits so neatly into Ezekiel's prophecy that the author had no trouble mixing the two, confirming God's word with details and ideas from his own time. Above all, where the Latin original wrote Gog and Magog, the middle High German Passau Anonymous translated into terms familiar to a German-speaking audience: the Red Jews.

13. Cf. Ezekiel 38,4-5: "... I will bring thee forth, and all thine army [....; even a great company with bucklers and shields: Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them [....]; the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands, and many people with thee".

Similarly, Konrad Steckel's middle High German translation (1359) of a Latin account written in the 1320s or 1330s by Odorico of Pordenone of his travels to China and Mongolia, adds a decisive element not present in the original Latin version. Odorico writes that he came to the 'Capian' mountains; Steckel in his translation corrects the spelling to 'Caspian' and notes that this is where the Red Jews are said to be enclosed. This translation is popular in tone and devoid of Latin learning (the "magnus Canis" [Great Khan] of the Latin original is translated as "der grosse hunt"

---

4. Jews, heretics and heathen; in Latin, judaei, haeretici, pagani. For the Middle Ages, see medieval crusade poetry: in the German-speaking lands, the Palästinalied of Walther von der Vogelweide contains a typical expression of this hostile image. For the later Middle Ages and Reformation, see Heiko A. Oberman, The Roots of Anti-Semitism in the Age of Renaissance and Reformation, tr. James I. Porter (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1984).

5. Konrad Steckels deutsche Übertragung der Reise nach China des Odorico de Pordenone, ed. Gilbert Strasmann (Berlin 1968; = Texte des späten Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit, 20), 118-119. For the Latin and German texts and English translations, see Appendix A, no. 5.
[the great dog]). When he comes to the Ca(s)pian Mountains, to which Odoric devoted one vague line, and which had been filtered by time and distance, Steckel knows immediately what they are and who lives there: the Red Jews.

In the middle Swedish Konung Alexander (c. 1380), Alexander comes across a horrible people: 'These are called the Red Jews'; they eat human beings, and all sorts of creatures, so Alexander prays for two mountains close by to come together; they were high and very long, and Alexander closed the area off with two gates, leaving the Red Jews therein: "the rodha iudha a'ra ther inne" (4041).

The middle High German version of the Gesta Romanorum,

---

4. The misspelling of the 'Caspian' Mountains and the lack of any details suggest that Odoric was following a dimly-remembered or poorly-understood tradition that belonged by a sort of established right in descriptions of the east, even if it played no role in the specific story now being told.

17. G.E. Klemming, ed., Konung Alexander. En medeltids dikt från Latinet vänd i Svenska rim omkring år 1380, på föranstaltande af Riksdrotset Bo Jonsson Grip (Stockholm, 1862); 130-133; esp. verses 3945 to 4044.

20. "han bodh twem berghom the standa a'n / ganga til saman badhin ij sa'n / the waro hoch ok mykith lang": Konung Alexander, 4009-4011.
Das ist der Roemer Tat dates to the 14th century.\footnote{Ed. Adalbert Keller (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1841; =Bibliothek der gesammten deutschen National-Literatur, 22), 9-10. For text and translation, see Appendix A, no. 3.} It describes the peoples enclosed by Alexander's pleas in the Caspian Mountains as the Ten Tribes abducted by the Assyrians, and calls them Red Jews; no Latin version of the Gesta ever does so. The German version enjoyed a widespread popularity in the 15th century.\footnote{It survives in 44 mss. and 7 early printed editions. W. Stammler and K. Langosch, Verfasserlexikon der deutschen Literatur des Mittelalters 3 (2nd ed., ed. Kurt Ruh et al., 1980), 32.} The apocalyptic content of this text is clear, and it is highly charged with 'anti-Red-Jewish' sentiment: "[God will destroy them] at the end of the world, when these people come out with their Antichrist and make martyrs out of the people [Christians]."\footnote{"Waz tüt er dann zú ent der werlt. Wann daz selb volk schvmt mit irem antichrist aus vr märternt die lœut...". Italics mine. See Appendix A, no. 3 for the full text and my translation.}

These last four examples are conclusive proof that the German name 'Red Jews', which connotes, as a rule, the conflation of Gog and Magog with the Ten Tribes of Israel, circulated in a purely vernacular sphere. The term was not mentioned in the original Latin texts, even when Gog and Magog or the 'Ca(s)pian Mountains' were being discussed. In the Konung Alexander, the Red Jews are appalling cannibals, just like 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' in its source, the Historia de preliis, and in the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius. In the middle High German translation of the Passau Anonymous, Gog and Magog are identified as the Ten Tribes, and further characterized as 'Jews who are called the Red Jews'. In the middle High German version of the Gesta Romanorum, the Ten Tribes are identified as the Red Jews. In both works, the Red Jews are intimately associated with the Antichrist as apocalyptic destroyers. Comestor's conflation and prophecy reach into the vernacular sphere where the Red Jews are 'code' for the Ten Tribes plus Gog and Magog -- who as distinct peoples are more at home in learned theology than in vernacular texts. Somewhere between these extremes is the work of Ludger of Braunschweig, himself at least nominally a cleric, but a writer of the vernacular.

In the tradition of both the middle High German Passau Anonymous and of Peter Comestor's re-enclosure by Alexander story, the strikingly popular and long-lived middle Dutch sielen trost or Großer Seelentrost (c. 1370) mentioned the Red Jews. This is a vernacular work of exegesis on the Ten

4. See the edition of Margarete Schmitt, Der Grosse Seelentrost. Ein niederdeutsches Erbauungsbuch des vierzehnten Jahrhunderts (Cologne/Graz, 1959). On pages 31-34, Schmitt lists the five surviving middle Low German manuscripts and the at least thirty printed editions in early modern Netherlandish, High German and Low German, from 1474 to 1800. It was printed frequently at Cologne, and once -- in 1478 -- at Augsburg. See chapter I.
Commandments, to which was appended a version of the Alexander story. The re-enclosure of the Ten Tribes in the Caspian Mountains by Alexander appears in two separate places, both according to the Comestorine tradition. However, in the commentary on the second commandment, under the rubric "Antichrist", the Red Jews are named as his followers in a passage derived more from the Pseudo-Methodian and Sibylline apocalyptic tradition: The Antichrist will be born of the tribe of Dan, of the Jewish race; "[When the Antichrist comes,] all the Jews follow him. The Red Jews, who are locked up, break out and follow him. They rebuild the temple at Jerusalem and worship him as a god and say that he is Christ, claiming that our Lord Jesus Christ was the Antichrist." The Red Jews are grafted into the Antichrist tradition, which is \[\text{\textsuperscript{5}}\]. The first time, in the commentary on the first commandment, 6-7: the Ten Tribes were led away into exile and "imprisoned" by the "King of Ninive" [i.e., Salmanasar, king of Assyria] for worshipping not God but idols, the Golden Calves; Alexander found them and refused their plea to be allowed to return to their homeland, and stopped up all the passes and ways leading out of their country, with God's help. The second mention is in the Alexander novel, 263.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{6}}\]. Schmitt, Seelentrost, 65. For the text and a translation, see Appendix A, no. 7. With the exception of the enclosed Red Jews, these details so close to those concerning the life of the Antichrist in Hugo Ripelin's Compendium that the latter can be considered as the source of this passage: the Antichrist is born in Babylon of the tribe of Dan; he claims to be God; his good angel abandons him; the Jews rebuild the Temple for him; he claims that Jesus was in fact the Antichrist: for the passage, see Appendix C, no. 4. The enclosed Jews (Ten Tribes/Gog and Magog) of Hugo's time have become the Red Jews in this version.
hardly surprising, as ever in Comestor, the 'conflated peoples' were to 'erupt' at the end of time and cause great damage in Christendom. Alexander is not mentioned in this context, although he is present in spirit: in the two 'Comestorine' passages cited above, in which Comestor's Alexander story is repeated, the Ten Tribes are said to be enclosed "until the advent of the Antichrist." In both instances, the Sibylline and Comestorine traditions overlap, but in the commentary on the second commandment, the popular, vernacular term surfaces from amongst the ferment of apocalyptic lore and learned exegesis.

In this text the Ten Tribes play the same role as the Red Jews in the camp of the Antichrist. In fact, it would be next to impossible to argue that there was in this text any difference between them, except in name: Jews or Red Jews. This is clear not because the author expresses it, but because he refers separately to the Red Jews and to the Ten Tribes, and means the same in both cases. The author and readers of this text might not have distinguished between the Red Jews

---

57. From Schmitt, Seelentrost: "Eyn berch sloth sijk an den anderen al vmme dat lant also ho, dat se dar inne bliuen mosten vnde sint dar noch inne vnde scholen jar inne bliuen also lange, bitte Entekerst kumpt. So komen se vt vnde voigen eme." (7); "Dar dede got en grot wunder, dat sik en berg an den anderen sloth, dar se noch hudes tages inne sin vnde solen dar also lange bliuen went Entekerst kumpt met sinister det." (263).
and Jews of the Ten Tribes -- precisely because from the perspective of Biblical exegesis, the non-Biblical Red Jews were t' Ten Tribes.

When the Red Jews function in other, especially secular contexts, such as the Trojanerkrieg, or Steckel's translation, they sometimes appear to be a separate people not governed by the pre-programmed eschatological and Biblical logic of the Comestor tradition. Oddly enough, the one early High German 'translation' of the sielen trost contains similar passages concerning 1) Alexander and the Ten Tribes, and 2) the Antichrist and the Jews -- but not the Red Jews! The printer, Anton Sorg, was not trapped in the vernacular. In his introduction, he mixes Latin phrases with his Swabian dialect. For him, as for nearly all other Latinate writers of medieval and early modern Europe, the legend of the Red Jews is too 'colorful', and he does not repeat it. However,

---

9. Der Seelelstrost, printed by Anton Sorg at Augsburg in 1478; now at the Württembergische Landesbibliothek in Stuttgart: Inc.fol.14582 HB.

9. Der Seelelstrost, fol. a'-a': "So uns bezeuqt der ewangelist also spreche(n) t. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serva ma(n)data dei das ist so vil, Wilt du eingan in das ewig leben/so halt die gebot gotes." I am indebted to Robert Bast for this reference.

9. It is a safe bet that Sorg was familiar with the popular Antichrist books that had been printed almost since the appearance of the printing press in Germany (see below), and which featured prominently the Red Jews.
he does reproduce the traditional association of the Jews with the Antichrist as his servants. For the Scripture-citing Sorg at least, what is important is that the Antichrist's associates are to be Jews tout court.

There are good reasons not to conclude that the Red Jews are simply interchangeable with the Ten Tribes in medieval or early modern sources. Many German texts, including the two oldest cited above, do not connect the Red Jews with Alexander, the Ten Tribes, the Antichrist or the Last Judgement. In these texts the Red Jews are a separate (Jewish) people, powerful, dangerous and foul. Nonetheless, in most cases, the confusion of the Red Jews with the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog was complete. During the sixteenth century, presumably under the influence of critical Bible study and the increasing availability of vernacular Bibles, the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog would be distinguished from one another again; the Red Jews would lead a shadowy but stubborn existence in vernacular pamphlets and popular belief as they were pushed farther toward the margins of the believable and the respectable.

In the Middle Ages, the term Red Jews is more than just another name for the Ten Tribes. It resides in the vernacular language and in the vernacular consciousness which that language expresses. It belongs not necessarily among the unlearned: Teutonic Knights, courtly poets, imitators of the Iliad and translators of Latin texts all used the term Red Jews as part of the vernacular lingua franca which they knew their audiences would understand. In such texts, the term invariably connotes a savage and unnatural people of particularly repulsive aspect. And although it sometimes means 'the Ten Tribes', when it appears side-by-side with them in the same exegetical contexts, the Red Jews are, in other texts, a separate, mythical, 'secular' people devoid of overt apocalyptic significance, disgusting and evil Jewish monsters -- like devilish Moors or dog-headed people (Kynocephales).

The term would continue to appear in German-language texts and to influence European thinking long after the idea that the Ten Tribes were Gog and Magog had been forgotten. To use the term Red Jews is to stress particular aspects of the 'Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander': their wickedness, their devalued physical attributes, their Jewishness, but also their strength compared to the weak, despised contemporary Jews to be found in the German-speaking lands, beyond the well-known program of their association with Antichrist. When the Red Jews appear in exegetical contexts, the term is charged both with apocalyptic content (and therefore essentially religious animus or fear) and with a heightened ethnic hatred. The frenzied antisemitic tone is similar to that found in charges of ritual murder or having killed Christ; but adds to the religious danger the secular and apocalyptic threat. The term 'Red Jews' articulates the idea of 'foul and unnatural Jews' who are cannibals and a physical, moral and military menace, painting in graphic strokes this final and fundamental threat to Christendom.

\[1\] Just as when the Ten Tribes appear in this context.

As we have seen, the Red Jews were marching to more than apocalyptic drums. Some time after 1446, a certain Gerhard Sprenger of Embrach copied an anonymous Jahrbuch concerning the city of Zurich, which dated from the middle of the fourteenth century. This breaks off in 1336, so Sprenger supplemented it with entries taken -- to judge by the archaic form of the language -- from other contemporary year-books. He continues the year-book up to 1446. In an entry concerning the second great year of the Black Death, 1349, an anonymous chronicler echoes the widespread contemporary belief that the Jews were responsible for the plague: they had poisoned the

---

12. Die beiden ältesten deutschen Jahrbücher der Stadt Zürich, ed. Ludwig Ettmüller (Zürich 1844; = Mittheilungen der Antiquarischen Gesellschaft in Zürich, II), 35-96. Gerhard Sprenger of Constance was a canon at Embrach at the time of the Council of Constance (1414-1418). The manuscripts used by Ettmüller, from the Bürgerbibliothek at Zurich, date from the fifteenth century and are of paper. See the foreword (35-38) for details.

13. Eg. 'ungehörtöst'.

14. Clement VI (Avignonese pope from 1342-1352) intervened three times, twice in 1348 (July 4 and September 26) and once in 1349 (October 20) to forbid this accusation and the ensuing wells, springs and streams. This entry documents the absolute horror of this unheard-of sickness, so contagious that even the breath of an infected person was known to be deadly. The chronicler is at a loss to explain such incredible virulence except by poison, a poison which itself must be exceptional. It was not enough that the Jews spread it, as he and many others claimed. To explain its extraordinary effects, he had recourse to the exotic, the outlandish and bizarre: the poison could be no ordinary one. He says it had been augmented ('spiked') with the venom of serpents or basilisks, expressing an idea fairly common in his time concerning the source of plague. Like the Red Jews, the poison was unrain, unclean or violence against Jews. See Joshua Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews, ch. VII, "The Poisoners", 97-108, esp. 102-105 concerning the Black Death. This belief was not confined to the fourteenth century: Jews were accused of poisoning wells and causing epidemics in Franconia (1357), Halle (1362), Rappoltsweiler, Dürkheim and Colmar (1397), Freiburg im Breisgau (1401), Cologne (1424), Schweidnitz (1448 and 1453), Regensburg (1472), Halle (early 1500s), Brieg 1541, Schweidnitz again (1543), Aix (1580) and Vienna (1679). This partial list is from Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews, 107-108. Gavin Langmuir notes in his book History, Religion and Antisemitism that one Christian explanation for the Plague was "the cosmic forces of evil were at work: the Jews, in league with the devil, were destroying Christians." (301). See also Séraphine Guerchberg, "The Controversies over the Alleged Sowers of the Black Death in the Contemporary Treatises on the Plague", in: Change in Medieval Society, ed. Sylvia L. Thrupp (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1964), 208-224, and Ernest Wickersheimer, Les accusations d'empoisonnement "Antwerp 1927".

"Unken", which means both poisonous serpents and the legendary basilisk. For details concerning the contemporary idea that the plague was caused by the breath of poisonous evil beyond all imagining. This description was especially appropriate because the Jews are said by the chronicler to have obtained the poison from the Red Jews."

Here is an example of one Christian's belief in collusion between the Jews of his time with the legendary but frighteningly 'real' and dangerous Red Jews: the suspect Jews of Europe are in league with the evil Red Jews. The adjective unrain is important: it characterizes not only the poison, but those who made it. Its use here is parallel to its leading role in the Alexander tradition, which had tarred Gog and Magog as "immundas gentes", and the Ten Tribes as unrain. The burning of Jews on charges of poisoning\^{7} the water is animals, such as serpents, dragons and basilisks, see Guerchberg, "Sowers of the Black Death", 214-215.

\^{6} "Diu selbe gift des ersten von den rotten juden kam..." See Appendix A, no.9 for the German text and my translation; see chapter I for a discussion of Rüttmüller's erroneous interpretations of this crucial line.

\^{7} A similar charge is made in Mandeville's Travels, cited again from the middle English translation, chapter XXII, in the section on strange stones, spices and people. Mandeville's Travels, ed. P. Hamelius, vol. I (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co. Ltd., 1919; = Early English Text Society, 153), 126, lines 10-20: [On the island of 'Pathen', near Java] "... ther ben other trees that beren hony gode - swete And other trees that beren venym [venom] against the whiche there is no medicyne but on [one] And that is to taken here propre leves - stampe hem - tempere him with water - than drynke it And ell [otherwise] he schall dye, for triacle will not avaylle ne non other medicyne. Of this venym the Iewes had let sechen of on of here frendes for to enpoysone all of christiantee as I haue herd hem seye in here confessioun before here dyenge. But thanked be all myghty god thei fayleden of hire purpos but allweys they maken gret mortalitee sufficient proof of a thoroughgoing and secular antisemitism. Who can doubt that the Red Jews were an integral part of this complex of hatred, when they are cited as the source of the alleged 'plague-poison'?

Contemporary learned treatises on the plague concentrated more on astrological and atmospheric influence than on contagion. The opinion rendered by the Parisian Faculty of Medicine at the request of Philip VI in the Compendium de Epidemia ... per Collegium Facultatis Medicorum Parisiis was that an unfavorable conjunction of the planets had caused the earth and bodies of water to exude noxious gas. When breathed, it goes straight to the heart and poisons the vital spirit that resides there; the internal organs rot in consequence.

of poeple." This reads, in modern English, starting with 'Of this venym...": "The Jews had asked one of their friends to procure [quantities of] this poison in order to poison all of Christendom, as I have heard them say in their confession[s] given just before dying [under torture/ at the stake?]. But almighty God be thanked, they failed in the attempt, though they constantly are killing large numbers of people." Might these 'frendes' be -- in French terms -- the Ten Tribes, in German the Red Jews, as in the Zurich Jahrbuch? The date of the French original, c. 1357, allows the conjecture that the 'failed attempt' to kill all of Christianity was indeed the Black Death, which moves this passage into close proximity to the entry for 1349 in the Zurich Jahrbuch.

See František Graus, Pest - Geißler - Judenmorde, for details of these accusations and for a discussion of the related phenomena of plague, flagellantism and pogroms.

Guerchberg, "Sowers of the Black Death", 210; the text is cited from the printing of the ms. (MS Lat. 11227, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris) by Hippolyte Emile Rebuis, Étude historique et critique de la Peste (Paris: Picard,
At least three learned writers, Konrad of Megenburg, Guy de Chauliac and Henry Lamme 'defended' Jews against charges of spreading plague -- because they ascribed plague to other, less concrete factors. The Zurich chronicle not only disregards such notions as astrological influence and atmospheric contamination, but specifies that plague spread by contact with infected persons, especially with their breath: an accurate description of the spread of pneumonic plague, presumably based on close observation and experience. Not learned speculation, but observed facts were the basis of this down-to-earth report. The intellectual 'place' or identity of the chronicler is not unimportant: what he saw around him, he observed closely. What he could not see, however, was the ultimate source of the plague. This he ascribed to the Jews, following the popular explanation of the day. We can distinguish two levels of 'medical' knowledge concerning the plague: one came out of books and learned speculation, and was from our perspective surprisingly wrong, yet it did not always make the monstrous mistake of seeing in the Jews the source of the plague; the other level, that of the unlearned, was based more on observation. In this instance, it comes closer to our physiological views, yet it made the appalling -- yet not surprising -- mistake of blaming the most convenient and most vulnerable scapegoat available for the disaster: the 'evil' Jews and their 'unclean' red brethren.

---

This unusual source recounting the supposed role of the Jews in the Black Death has survived. It is not unreasonable to speculate that other German-speaking contemporaries blamed not only the Jews, but also the Red Jews. Similar charges probably circulated in France and inspired the accusation of such a conspiracy in Mandeville's Travels. The German physician Heinrich Ribbeniz of Breslau, who wrote a treatise on the plague around 1370, claims, without noting a source, that "... the Jews of Milan know a mountain nearby where a plant called napellus grows, which is the worst of poisons. [...] [T]he Jews [are not] permitted to go there lest they collect this plant and destroy the whole world or at least many Christians with its poison." This last reference suggests that the plague of mid-century had been a 'Jewish conspiracy' -- and that plague was part of a wider Jewish policy of aggression and destruction.

---

2. This is Guerchberg's conclusion; she also notes how odd it was that "so convinced an astrologer could assign poisoners any important role in the origin of the plague." "Sowers of the Black Death", 217. This seeming contradiction may well be the result of a clash in Ribbeniz' science between learned astrological theories and popular explanations that needed no proof-texts, as they were common coin.
The connection between the Jews of Europe and the Red Jews was neither incidental nor the result of a vague animus. Learned German physicians and French compilers of travel tales looked for the sources of the plague poison allegedly used by the Jews in the Far East, or in the Alps, but the chronicler of Zurich looked where the vernacular German tradition 'told' him to look: under the menacing rubric of the Red Jews. The supposed connection between the Jews and their red cousins was based on widespread belief in a Jewish conspiracy to harm or even destroy Christianity, a belief that fit well with the equally widespread certainty that the Jews had poisoned the wells, the rivers or even the air to cause plague outbreaks. The Red Jews, important but little-known players in German popular culture, ought to take their place in the history of antisemitic propaganda in German vernacular culture. They served in the Zurich Jahrbuch as a pièce justificative in the foregone trial and condemnation of the Jews who were burned to death in 1349 and 1350 all over Europe.

Around a century later, the associations inherent in the term 'Red Jews' had undergone little change. The "Chronik des Burkhard Zink (1368-1468)" mentions the Red Jews ("rott Juden") once in a seemingly ambiguous context. The term is misunderstood by Matthias Lexer as rotte, meaning troop or host of warriors. Indeed, the form of the word (double "t"; final "e" elided) allows both "troop" and "red" as meanings.

The larger context is military, so Lexer assumes that rot(te) means troop, host. Lexer apparently was not familiar with the legend of the Red Jews. The immediate context, the arrival of the Dauphin Louis (later Louis XI) with his troops at Montbeliard (Mömpelgard) in 1444, suggests that "500 rot Juden" means not '500 troops of Jews' (many thousands of Jewish soldiers, in judenrein France no less!), but '500 Red Jews': they are mentioned in the same breath with "1000 Armagnacs". The 'Armagnacs' were early mercenaries; they would also be employed by Frederick III during the First War of Zurich (1440-1446). Their reputation was built on their proclivity for plunder and pillage. Both are described as 'the most evil people on earth and the cruelest people that ever might live on earth.' The Red Jews are also called "groß

2. Cf. the Zurich year-book and the Trojanerkrieg: "rotte Juden"; see also the discussion in chapter I.

3. See Appendix A, no. 10 for the German original: "[Louis] had arrived at Montbéliard [Mömpelgard] with 20,000 men, among whom were, they say, about 500 Red Jews; also there was the count of Armagnac with 1,000 men. They say that the big Jews and the Armagnacs are the most evil people on earth and the cruelest people that ever might live on earth." Louis IX reigned from 1461-1483.
Juden", large Jews. This sounds like what we know of the war-like, cruel, evil Red Jews. The reference may be an elliptical and degrading way of describing Turks or Tatars -- with whom Luther would identify the Red Jews not quite a century later -- or some other foreign mercenaries in the service of the French Dauphin during this last phase of the Hundred Years War.

At approximately the same time Sprenger was copying the Zurich Jahrbuch with its damning reference to the Red Jews and Burkhard Zink was penning his history, the popular Antichrist books were already circulating in the German-speaking lands. Based on a variety of sources, but most clearly on the thirteenth-century Compendium theologicae veritatis of the Strasbourg Dominican Hugo Ripelin, this genre evolved at the beginning of the fifteenth century. The earliest manuscripts have been dated to 1430. The immense popularity of this vernacular compilation, which also drew both materials and authority from the Legenda aurea, was only heightened by the advent of printing. This vernacular concoction became available first as a chiroxylographic book, which combined

7. Jacobs and Ukert, Zeiträge zur älteren Litteratur, 115, note 3; Burger, Der Antichrist, 18-22.

7. The Legenda was compiled by the Genoese Dominican Jacob a Voragine (1228/30-1298).
printed woodcut illustrations with hand-written captions, then as a xylographic print (woodcut plates with images and text), and finally as a typographically-printed text. Thus, it could be purchased by ever-larger groups at a theoretically diminishing price -- in any case, at much lower cost than a manuscript copy.

The vernacular chiroxylographic Antichrist of 1450 and

---

1. Der Antichrist und die fünfzehn Zeichen. Faksimile-Ausgabe des einzig erhaltenen chiroxylographischen Blockbuches, ed. H. Th. Musper (Munich 1970), 2 vols. [hereafter Antichrist 1450]. The original, which comes from the Fürstlich Oettingen-Wallersteinsche Bibliothek, is in the Bibliothek Otto Schaefer at Schweinfurt. It has been dated to around 1470 by Georg Schübel in a contribution to volume I entitled "Sprache und Alter des Blockbuches" (41-49; esp. 45), but the editor assigns it to the period around 1450, probably Nuremberg, in his chapter "Der chiroxylographische Antichrist", vol. I, 20-40; esp. 30.

the typographic Strasbourg Antichrist of 1480 feature woodcuts depicting the Queen of the Amazons surrounded by Jews, clearly recognizable by their dress, doing homage to the Antichrist.\(^q\) The accompanying text states that these are "the Red Jews enclosed by Alexander the Great in the Caspian Mountains".\(^q\) The next page describes the great pilgrimage to the Antichrist at Jerusalem, a scene that dates back to the Tubritine Sibyl. The text itself mentions as one of its sources the thirteenth-century Compendium theologiae veritatis, but clearly also relies on the 'Antichrist plus Red Jews' tradition as represented in Von Gottes Zukunft, the Passau Anonymous, the middle Low German silen tröst and the middle High German version of the Gesta Romanorum. No source need be cited; the Red Jews are 'in the air', common knowledge. This travesty of a pilgrimage begins with the Red Jews breaking out and doing great damage to the world; "these same Jews are called Gog and Magog and their Ten Tribes".\(^4\)

These texts represent an important sample of the earliest

\(^q\) Antichrist 1480, 14b. Cf. the Passau Anonymous, above.

\(^4\) From the 1480 text: "Des ersten prechen die roten juden uß.vnd die tund der welt gros not/vnd die selben Juden heissen gog/vnd magog.vnd ir zehen geschlecht." See Appendix A, no. 11b, fol. 14.
German incunabula. They stand at the mid-point on a long line of vernacular literature, exegesis and history that sees in the Red Jews both an 'unclean' or foul nation and the apocalyptic destroyers of Ezekiel and Revelation. It would be excessive to argue that the difference between the Red Jews and the Ten Tribes is fundamental; yet there is a difference: in tone, in intellectual sophistication, in social level and in polemical intent. The Red Jews are also Gog and Magog, whereas the Ten Tribes are not apocalyptic destroyers, except as Christians interpreted Jewish hopes for their return, and associated them with the Antichrist -- under the name Red Jews or Gog and Magog. In the few medieval texts (the Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg and the Zurich Jahrbuch) where the Red Jews are not immediately involved in the Alexander story and apocalyptic prophecies, they are a distinctly evil, but accessible nation, who can be reached by travellers and who are neither invincible nor 'at the door': they live far away and pose no immediate danger; their peculiarity consists not in an apocalyptic role, but in their foulness and evil -- traits traditionally associated with 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander'. The name Red Jews and its particular associations would survive for three centuries and, seen in turn through ever-changing filters, would function in novel contexts increasingly distinct from the Comestorine tradition. Where the Red Jews were equated with the Ten Tribes, the latter name was often omitted, while the former focused a tangible, physical revulsion and apocalyptic horror.

Christian knowledge or suspicion of the hopes entertained by European Jews in regard to the Ten Tribes seems to have played a part in the construction of this nightmarish vision of the Red Jews -- where else did Comestor get the legend of the Ten Tribes and their return? Not only the apocalyptic threat posed by this wild horde, but their vividly-imagined physical appearance and anticipated presence were the clear objects of the abomination expressed in the name Red Jews.

1. The Audience: Text and Context

The question of audience is a vexed one. Beyond the clear evidence that the Red Jews appeared only in works written in German for a non-Latinate audience, there is little or no evidence of who read these works apart from the clues provided by the texts themselves. Courtly epic poetry, such as the Jüngere Titurel and the Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg, were evidently written for a courtly audience, but that bare fact does not describe their actual audience with any precision: Reformation-era pamphlets were not the first texts to be read aloud to large and diverse audiences. As we follow the tradition of the Red Jews through the Middle Ages and on into the Reformation, the texts in which this legend occurs grow more frequent and more popular. An entry in a chronicle, a German translation of a Latin travelogue, or a military report take us far from the realm of court patrons of literature, or even of wealthy bourgeois book-buyers. When we encounter the Red Jews in the fifteenth-century Antichrist books, we can be sure that the legend is circulating widely -- yet the precise audience remains indeterminable. Texts reflect and help to form a larger world of ideas and beliefs, rooted in tradition and circulating over large areas. The complex interaction of text and belief is revealed by the changing nature of depictions of the Red Jews from the thirteenth through the seventeenth century.

The cost of books, although comparable to that of manuscripts in the 'experimental' period of printing (to about 1460), dropped sharply over the last half of the century, as printing techniques and commercial distribution developed. Yet it is clear that the Antichrist book was not selling for a few pennies, as some Reformation-era pamphlets would. It was still a book; and although many books would be printed in runs of two hundred to four hundred copies in the 1470s and over 1,000 copies from the 1480s on, the chiroxylographic edition of c.1450 probably did not extend to more than a hundred copies; the later typographical editions may have reached numbers in the high hundreds or low thousands.4

---

What, therefore, can we say about the readership of these texts? It was never large, by modern standards, and yet assuming a relatively equal survival rate for such works, that any survived at all is indicative of a certain popularity, without even referring to the long printing history (1450-1516) of the Antichrist books. Yet can we conclude that the legend of the Red Jews moved 'down' the social/class scale over the course of the Middle Ages, simply because the evidence now available places it first in courtly texts, after which it makes its way into vernacular exegetical works, German translations of Latin texts and printed texts designed for a fairly large market? Absolutely not. That would allow the evolution of literacy, textual genre and the value-laden mechanisms that preserved certain kinds of texts (courtly or pious) more readily than worldly or (quasi-) official works to determine the 'descent' of an idea. There is in all likelihood no way to determine the audience of a given idea outside the textual tradition in which it was preserved; and although we know the legend of the Red Jews was available in more

4. This is nothing more than a guess based on similar figures for very early incunabula listed by Hirsch, Printing, Selling and Reading, 55-66.
'popular' textual genres in 1348 and 1470 than those which featured it in 1270, we do not know whether this legend was truly widespread among the common people at either time. However, we now know that it existed in German texts from 1270 on, and that it later was available not only in courtly literature, but in vernacular prose narratives, translations of Latin works, German-language exegetical and religious texts and the German printed book: a modest discovery, but a real one.

In the German-speaking lands from the thirteenth to the late fifteenth century, Red Jews were terrifying figures. They were uncontrolled foreigners, armed non-Christians not subject to Christian authority. They were the apocalyptic destroyers Gog and Magog prophesied in Ezekiel and Revelations. They were the revolting peoples Alexander locked up to protect the rest of the world. They were the innumerable hordes of the Ten Tribes. Apocalyptic fear and hope were associated with stories about the Ten Tribes. In medieval German texts, the Red Jews were for some the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog; but for others, they were simply Jews, Jews of a particularly evil and dangerous variety. In either case, they were distinct enough to merit a pejorative label of their own. In Leonardo Olschki's words, they are a concrete entity that reflects the popular medieval predilection for the concrete, the easily-named and quickly-grasped. No elaborate Biblical name, but a direct appeal to the senses and to the integral socio-religious antisemitism of the time is behind the German designation. They were the 'stubborn' or 'blind' Jews who will, according to Pseudo-Methodius and medieval apocalyptic, gather around the Antichrist and revere him as their Messiah in the last days. Finally, they were sinful, uncontrolled, exotic Jews who, in contrast to the Jews of Europe, possess military might that not only prevents their subjugation but threatens Christendom itself. They were physically repulsive (Trojanerkrieg) and provided European Jews with the plague-poison for wells and streams.

From the twelfth century on, a fantastical but thoroughly tradition- and text-based Christian Feindbild increasingly identified the ten lost tribes of Israel with Gog and Magog, the Mongols or the Tatars. In the thirteenth century, it was heated up to fever pitch in German texts by the addition of the opprobrious color red, which was identified with the Jews through depictions of Judas. Red applied to people refers to a morally-suspect hair color as a kind of shorthand for moral deviance or degeneration. The remarkable name may account for the longevity of the tradition in Germany, especially in vernacular texts, when other cultures knew only Gog and Magog, or the Ten Tribes. There seems to have been no particular reason why the Red Jews were limited to German texts, except that catchy and meaningful names are often applied by a culture to the objects and phenomena in which it is most interested, of which it constantly speaks and speculates. My research simply has not come across the Red Jews outside the German sphere of cultural influence.

In the medieval tradition, the despised color of the Red Jews -- a symbol of faithlessness and sinfulness -- was both a mark and a guarantee of the abhorrence they inspired. This special revulsion, this 'colorful' apocalyptic anxiety, a xenophobic projection of threatening otherness onto an already angst-ridden projection -- this was the most remarkable element in the German legend of the Red Jews.

[7] A 'fax' (facsimile transmission) machine, the Canadian word 'hydro' (meaning both electrical power and the companies that provide it) and the 'Reds' of the Cold War are examples of the shorthand that both results from and facilitates the use (and overuse) of a constantly-recurring expression or idea.
V: THE MEDIEVAL ANTICHRIST AND HIS JEWISH HENCHMEN

1. The Antichrist: What or Who

It would not be difficult to dismiss the medieval legend of the Antichrist as pure fantasy -- analogous to such entertaining motifs as fire-breathing dragons, unicorns, enchantments and the like. The Antichrist was, in our terms, an 'imaginary' figure, a product of the collective, historical, theological, mythopoeic functions of the imagination. In our terms: to medieval Christians, the Antichrist was a terrifying reality. Matthew of Janow (+1394) wrote that the Antichrist was so universally and thoroughly discussed that when he appeared, even the little children would instantly know him.¹

Learned Biblical exegesis has tended to interpret the Beast of Revelation 13, the basis of the Antichrist legend, as a corporate entity -- the totality and final sum of evil in the world. However, medieval and early modern Latin authors less concerned with precise Biblical scholarship than with that part of the Christian tradition which they knew best, and the vernacular sources that interpreted learned theology for the non-Latinate in literary or exegetical genres provide evidence for a strikingly different and more popular interpretation. To the broad masses of western Christendom, and to many learned clerks, the Antichrist was a real person who would be born, live and die, often in a perverse parody of

¹. Cited by Joshua Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews, 39. For a lively depiction of medieval beliefs concerning the Antichrist and the Jews, see pages 12-38. To medieval Christians, the Antichrist was "no legendary dragon spouting imaginary fire; he was a terrifying reality" (37-38); "...the Antichrist was no mere creature of scholarly dispute but the deeply disturbing concern of everyone." (39).
Jesus' life, at the End of Time. He would persecute true believers and set up an ungodly realm of terror on earth. Starting in the early Middle Ages, Christian belief assimilated the Jewish Messiah to the Christian Antichrist. Christians came to see in the Antichrist they expected at the End of Time the figure the Jews believed would be their Messiah. Twelfth century vernacular literary and exegetical texts express the idea that the despised Jews would play a major role as the servants, supporters and troops of the Antichrist when he came to devastate Christendom. The post-Comestorine German version of the Gog and Magog story in which

The same distinction between a corporate and a personal Antichrist has been made by Curtis Bostick in his dissertation "The Antichrist as Threat to Heaven and Earth. The Urgency of Reform on the Eve of the Reformation in England" (University of Arizona, 1993). Bostick notes that the theologians Tyndale and Wyclif generally saw the Antichrist as a corporate entity, whereas at the popular level, the Lollards looked for the final advent of a real person. However, most students of the Antichrist traditions have not seen this distinction as central: Emmerson, for example, calls the personal interpretation "a standard and widely accepted understanding of Antichrist" (Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 7); the main alternative to this view, he suggests, is the political interpretation that from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries identified the Antichrist with a specific pope, political figure, opponent, heretic or reformer, a view that was to prevail in the sixteenth century with the Protestants, who understood the entire Roman Catholic church as Antichrist (Idem). My study shows that there is a real distinction between the allegorizing or symbolic view of high theology and the personal view that indeed did win out and become 'standard and widely accepted' among the majority of western Christians. In fact, both these ancient traditions were necessary for the later identification of specific personages (a pope or an emperor, usually) with the Antichrist -- whether by Rupert of Deutz (see below) or by Luther.
the Jewish Ten Tribes were cast as the Red Jews, fit perfectly into the 'personal' interpretation of the Antichrist. Such details as his place of birth, parentage, lifespan and deeds varied. A multiplicity of traditions was enlisted to make sense of Scripture, of Sibylline and other apocalyptic texts and of the portents and 'signs of the times' medieval Christians were so ready to see in cataclysmic events over which they had no control: invasion, plague, famine, war.

In order to understand the social and intellectual place of the popular view that saw in the Antichrist a real person, it is necessary first to review the allegorizing and symbolic learned tradition, especially in the form it took in the German-speaking world. The allegorizing method is the opposite pole to the personal interpretation. Occupying an exegetical middle ground, the 'political' method of reformers like Wyclif, Nicholas of Janov and Luther, which interprets 'Rome' or 'the Papacy' or even 'the Pope' as Antichrist, would dominate Reformation-era discussion of the Antichrist.

Medieval and late medieval German literary texts, many of which we have already examined in our discussion of the Red

---

1. This tradition has received very little attention outside specialized German scholarship, such as Rauh's Das Bild von dem Antichrist. The allegorizing method is not the direct thematic ancestor of the concrete interpretations to be found in later medieval German texts. This break reveals a great deal about the social place and the mentality of the popular tradition.
Jews, will be adduced to demonstrate the association made between the Antichrist and the Jews, as well as between the Antichrist and the Red Jews. Vernacular sermons, exegetical manuals for the illiterati and a staged dialogue between a monk and a Jew provide a representative sample of the media by which popular beliefs circulated from roughly 1150 to the beginning of the Reformation.

Some of the most effective vehicles of popular medieval beliefs and ideas concerning the Antichrist are the Passion Plays and Fastnachtsspiele (carnival plays). The focus here is on Germany, but a brief look at French and English equivalents will establish the European context and underscore German particularities.

2. An Unusual Birth: Antichrist in Antiquity

The Antichrist figure is an amalgam of 'myth, popular folklore, and current history' that seems to have developed parallel to the efflorescent Christology of the early Church.¹ The Antichrist conceived of in human terms, along the lines of Christ's incarnation, is an anthropomorphic and concrete interpretation of the 'Beast' of the Johannine Apocalypse.

¹. This suggestion is made by Bernard McGinn, Visions of the End. Apocalyptic Traditions in the Middle Ages (New York: Columbia University Press, 1979), 16-17.
One of the earliest witnesses to this belief is the fourth-century Tiburtine Sibyl, a Christian apocalyptic text based in part on the earlier Sibyllines, though firmly anchored in Patristic apocalyptic. Originally composed in Greek, but soon translated into Latin, this text interprets the Christian apocalypse of John through pagan oracular traditions, mediated by Jewish apocalyptic thought. The

For precise details and a listing of testimony from the early Fathers of the Church -- including Jerome, Hippolytus, Lactantius and Chrysostom, most of which tends toward seeing the Antichrist as a human being possessed or energized by the Devil, or as the Devil incarnate -- see Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 133-135 and 137-142. Bousset expands on the origins of the Antichrist legend in Jewish apocalyptic, and before that, in ancient (Hebrew) tales of a repeat of God's primeval battle with the Dragon of the depths, the marine monster (Leviathan); "The expectation [in the Jewish myth of the final battle] is not of any hostile ruler and of the oppression of Israel by him and his army, but of a struggle of Satan directly with God, of a conflict of the Dragon with the Almighty throned in heaven. To me the Antichrist legend seems a simple incarnation of that old Dragon myth, which has in the first instance nothing to do with particular political powers and occurrences. For the dragon is substituted the man armed with miraculous powers who makes himself God's equal -- a man who in the eyes of the Jews could be no other than the false Messiah." Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 144-145. Bousset admits that the medieval myth emphasized the human and 'political' aspects of the Antichrist, but insists on the demonic background of the Antichrist as 'dragon' -- a motif that never died out and was used to such effect in the antipapal pamphlets of the Protestant Reformation.

medieval church accorded the Sibylline texts an almost canonical status as the 'prophets' of classical antiquity.¹

The oldest surviving version of the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl is an early eleventh-century Latin reworking, probably from northern Italy.² The popularity of this text is attested to by its complicated and far-flung history. The text edited by Ernst Sackur has been influenced by the Revelations of Pseudo-Methodius (7th century), though the details concerning 1664), 581-607; 581. For precise details on the 'proto-Antichrist' figure Belial or Beliar, the 'man of sin' known to St. Paul (2 Cor. 6,15) from the Jewish apocalyptic tradition, see Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 136-137, and his "Note on Belial", 153-156. The Sibylline prophecies also borrowed the name from Jewish writings: Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 137. Rauh provides a close look at the original political context of the Sibylline texts and their subsequent use as 'instruments of politics' (e.g., the description of Emperor Henry IV by a Gregorian monk, between 1084 and 1095 as an antichrist-like king, with whom the horrifying End Time will begin): Das Bild des Antichrist. 138-145; esp. 143. For the relevant passage from the Tiburtine Sybil, see Appendix C, no. 1.

¹. The medieval formula "teste David cum Sibylla" (with the witness of David and the Sibyl) was a guarantee of double ancient authority. McGinn, Visions of the End, 20. Emmerson notes that during the Middle Ages the Sibylline Oracles, whether Christian in origin or not, were often considered inspired: Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 47.

². McGinn, Visions of the End, 43. McGinn cites the reconstruction of the widespread tradition, including two families of Latin texts, done by P.J. Alexander, The Oracle of Zaalbek: The Tiburtine Sibyl in Greek Dress (Washington, D.C.: Dumbarton Oaks, 1967), and reproduces the stemma on p. 295. The Latin text edited by Ernst Sackur ('W') is an early eleventh-century copy of the lost late tenth-century 'W'; for the relevant passage, see Appendix C, no. 1.
Antichrist are not identical.

The Latin Tiburtine Sibyl stands in a line of apocalyptic traditions that depicted the Antichrist as a false Messiah: a Jewish Antichrist will be born of the tribe of Dan to reign as a false prophet and false Messiah from a rebuilt Jerusalem.\(^9\) To Jerome, Jer. 9,14-16 predicted the punishment of the Jews for preferring Antichrist to Christ.\(^10\) Jewish and Christian apocalyptic diverged here, mirroring the deepening rift during the late Empire between the 'New Israel' and the 'old'. However, much of medieval Christian apocalyptic ignored the topic of the Jews except insofar as they -- or some of them --

\(^9\) Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews, 32-34; McGinn, Visions of the End, 17. According to Trachtenberg, the idea that the Antichrist will be born of the tribe of Dan "is unquestionably related to the Jewish conception that the Messiah would be derived from this tribe on the maternal side" (note 5 to chapter 2, pages 224-225). Emmerson notes that this idea, found first in the Tiburtine Sibyl, was based on Gen. 49,16-17, Deut. 33,22, and Jer. 3,16; indeed, all the main elements that came to be associated with the Antichrist's appearance in the last days were drawn, sometimes through very distorting filters, from the Bible: Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 46. On the parentage and birth of the Antichrist, see Emmerson's summary of the various traditions, ibid., 79-83.

\(^10\) Suggesting that the Antichrist was a 'Baal', an idol for whom the Jews would forsake the God of Israel. Jerome, In Hieremiam prophetam, 2.78.2, I Chr LXXIV.97. See also the Glossa ordinaria: Biblia sacra cum glossis interlinearis, et ordinaria, Nicolai Lyrae postilla, ac moralitalibus, Burgensis additionibus et Thoringi replicis, 7 vols. (Venice, 1588), vol. 4, fol. 125r (cited from Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, note 26 to chapter 2, 253).
were to convert before the Last Judgment.\textsuperscript{12}

The salient elements of the ‘Jewish Antichrist’ tradition are already present in the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl, which describes the ‘Son of Perdition’ as born of the ‘tribe of Dan’ (one of the ten lost tribes).\textsuperscript{13} This detail provided a \textsuperscript{12}. The Joachimite apocalyptic tradition, for example, does not assign any malign role in the Last Things to the Jews; neither do Bonaventure, the Franciscan Spirituals, St. Vincent Ferrer (despite his fervid antisemitic tendencies), the Hussites and other noteworthy prophets of the End. See Marjory Reeves, Joachim of Fiore and the Prophetic Future.

\textsuperscript{13}. Here is the relevant passage from the Tiburtine Latin Sibyl in Bernard McGinn’s translation. ‘At that time the Prince of Iniquity who will be called Antichrist will arise from the tribe of Dan. He will be the Son of Perdition, the head of pride, the master of error, the fullness of malice who will overturn the world and do wonders and great signs through dissimulation. He will delude many by magic art so that fire will seem to come down from heaven. The years will be shortened like the months, the months like the weeks, the weeks like the days, the days like the hours, and an hour like a moment. The unclean nations that Alexander, the Indian king, shut up [i.e., Gog and Magog] will arise from the North. These are the twenty-two realms whose number is like the sand of the sea. When the king of the Romans hears of this he will call his army together and vanquish and utterly destroy them. After this he will come to Jerusalem, and having put off the diadem from his head and laid aside the whole imperial garb, he will hand over the empire of the Christians to God the Father and to Jesus Christ his Son. When the Roman empire shall have ceased, then the Antichrist shall be openly revealed and will sit in the House of the Lord in Jerusalem. While he is reigning, two very famous men, Elijah and Enoch, will go forth to announce the coming of the Lord. Antichrist will kill them and after three days they will be raised up by the Lord. Then there will be a great persecution, such as has not been seen before nor shall be thereafter. The Lord will shorten those days for the sake of the elect, and the Antichrist will be slain by the power of God through Michael the Archangel on the Mount of Olives.' From Visions of the End, 49-50. For Sackur’s Latin text, see Appendix C, no. 1. Trachtenberg attempts to make a distinction not borne out by the sources when he claims convenient point of reference for later Christian depictions of the apocalyptic destroyers as Jews (whether the Ten Tribes or the Red Jews), especially once the story of Alexander enclosing Gog and Magog in a mountain fastness had been added to the narrative of the Antichrist’s advent and reign — for the first time in the fifth-century "Syrian Legend Concerning Alexander".\(^\text{15}\)

that the Antichrist legend, "as distinct from the simple belief in the coming of this figure, is of comparatively late origin"; i.e., the tenth century: The Devil and the Jews, 32. This fourth-century text already contains all the main elements of what he calls the Antichrist legend.

\(^{12}\) Trachtenberg is one of the very few modern commentators on the Antichrist and the Jews who has noticed the Red Jews and correctly placed them in the context of the apocalyptic peoples enclosed by Alexander who will serve the Antichrist. However, he cites only one source (the 1596 pamphlet; see Appendix A, number 21), otherwise relying for the rich and largely unknown medieval tradition on the not-entirely-accurate reporting of Preuß, Die Vorstellungen vom Antichrist, 17 and 18, note 1: The Devil and the Jews, 39-40.

\(^{15}\) This is the first instance of the fusion, which was to be characteristic for the middle ages as a whole, of the Alexander legend and late classical apocalypticism. A Latin translation was made in the tenth century by a Neapolitan priest: Cary, The Medieval Alexander, p. 11. The most complete version is that ascribed to the Syrian ecclesiastic writer Jacob of Serugh (c.451-521). E.A. Wallis Budge edited the Syriac text and translated it into English in his The History of Alexander the Great. McGinn reproduces a portion of this text in Visions of the End, 57-59. The relevant passage is as follows: "Then the hosts of Agog and of the house of Magog shall go forth, / And man shall fall upon his fellow, and nation upon nation, / And the quaking of the earth and the sword of anger shall be there. / On the skirts of Zion shall the bodies of the dead lie in heaps. / And after these things the earth shall be desolated of mankind, / Villages shall be destroyed and all towns and cities; / The scattered ones only remain in the earth as a remnant. / Then shall Antichrist rise
The seventh-century Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius were, after the Book of Daniel and the Revelation of John, one of the most influential and widespread of medieval apocalyptic texts. The Revelationes also fuse the ancient story of Alexander enclosing the 'unclean peoples' (among whom Gog and Magog are numbered) behind bronze gates in the northern mountains with the Antichrist legend. First, the 'unclean peoples' break out of their mountainous prison and sweep through the world, killing and eating people and terrifying the whole world. When the Antichrist has arisen, the king of the Romans will give up his crown on Golgotha and hand over the kingdom of the Christians to God. All political organisation and power (i.e., all protection against enemies) will disappear, and the world will be given over entirely to the Antichrist, the Son of Perdition.\(^6\)

\(\text{upon the whole earth ..." (} \text{Visions of the End, 59, lines 647-654. For a brief contextual discussion, see } \text{Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 26-28.}\)

\(^6\) McGinn, Visions of the End, 70 (see ch. 2, note 8). Again, Trachtenberg does not cite this extraordinarily influential tradition, which is one of the main vehicles of the Antichrist legend in the middle ages.

\(^7\) In McGinn's translation: "After a week of years, when they [sc. Gog and Magog etc.] have already captured the city of Joppa, the Lord will send one of the princes of his host and strike them down in a moment. After this the king of the Romans will go down and live in Jerusalem for seven and half-seven times [i.e., years]. When the ten and a half years are completed the Son of Perdition will appear.

He will be born in Chorazaim, nourished in Bethsaida, and reign in Capharnaum. Chorazaim will rejoice because he was born in her, and Capharnaum because he will have reigned in her. For this reason in the third Gospel the Lord gave the following statement: 'Woe to you Chorozaim, woe to you Bethsaida, and to you Capharnaum -- if you have risen up to heaven, you will descend even to hell' (Luke 10.13-15). When the Son of Perdition has arisen, the king of the Romans will ascend Golgotha upon which the wood of the Holy Cross is fixed, in the place where the Lord underwent death for us. The king will take the crown from his head and place it on the cross and stretching out his hands to heaven will hand over the kingdom of the Christians to God the Father. The cross and the crown of the king will be taken up to heaven. [...] When the Cross has been lifted up on high to heaven, the king of the Romans will directly give up his spirit. Then every principality and power will be destroyed that the Son of Perdition may be manifest." McGinn, Visions of the End, 76. See Appendix C, no. 2, for Sackur's Latin text.
The association of the Antichrist with the peoples enclosed by Alexander was firmly fixed in Christian consciousness in late antiquity. Given the belief that the Antichrist would be born of Jewish lineage, especially of the tribe of Dan (one of the ten lost tribes) the stage was set for Comestor's identification of the nations enclosed by Alexander with the Ten Tribes. A exegetical triangle, of which each element confirms and authenticates the other two, thus came into being and dominated medieval ideas concerning the dramatis personae of the End Times: the (Jewish) Antichrist will be accompanied by the savage 'unclean nations/Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander', who are the (Jewish) Ten Tribes.

This association is noted by Bousset, The Antichrist Legend, 102-103 -- but he does not mention the main medieval texts that developed, communicated or made credible this central feature of medieval apocalypticism.
3. Holy and Roman: Ancient Ideas Concerning Antichrist in the Early Middle Ages

The ancient tradition represented by the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl was decisive for medieval visions of the end. Hrabanus Maurus (c.776-856), Archbishop of Mainz, summed it up in the ninth century, adding what would be the standard Christian view of the Jewish Messiah for centuries to come: "The Jews dream of the coming of their Christ, whom we know to be the Antichrist."19

A ninth-century Latin lyric neatly compressed the essential elements of the ancient tradition into a few lines:

Antichristus est venturus permitente domino
In Babilonia nascetur conceptus de diabolo
Dan de tribu erit ortus ex Ebreorum populo."20

The Letter on the Antichrist of the abbot Adso (910-992), composed around 950, was a compilation based largely on early medieval summaries of patristic teaching on the Antichrist.21

---

20. "The Antichrist will arrive when God decrees. He will be born in Babylon, having been conceived by the Devil. He will be descended from the tribe of Dan, of the Hebrew people." Cited by Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 33, from "Quique cupitis audire," in: Poetarum Latinorum Medii Aevi, 4.1: Rhythmi aevi Merovingici et Carolini, MGH (Berlin, 1914), no. 38, stanza 2.

21. For a brief treatment of Adso’s letter, see Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 153-164. The standard work on Adso is by Robert Konrad, De ortu et tempore Antichristi. Antichristvorstellung und Geschichtsbild im des Abtes Adso von Montier-en-Der (Kallmünz, 1964). See also McGinn, Visions of the End,
The Letter is modeled on a typical saint's life. Unlike the tradition of Tyconius -- in which the Antichrist is conceived of in corporate terms as consisting of enemies of the Church, and which takes its cue from Jerome and Augustine --, Adso's Letter is personal and historical, not collective and moralizing. Relying on the exegesis of 2 Thess. 2,4 by Haimo of Auxerre (+865/866), which Adso copied nearly word-for-word, the abbot states that the Son of Perdition is neither a heathen nor a Christian, but a Jew, and not just any Jew, but the false Messiah. He circumcises himself and claims to be the Christ promised to the Jews; they, thinking to receive Christ, receive the Devil instead.

Although Adso did not know the Tiburtine Sibyl, he was familiar with the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius, in which the Antichrist was also depicted as an individual. Adso 'westernized' the myth for local, west-Frankish consumption, substituting for the 'king of the Romans' or 'emperor of the Romans and Greeks' the 'rex Francorum' (his patron). These elements of Adso's version of the legend, repeated and spread by a rich manuscript tradition, helped shape the later history of Western thought concerning the Antichrist.

4. The Allegorical Antichrist: German Symbolism

The Antichrist would continue to be interpreted by many clerical commentators as a corporate entity, the 'historical continuum of those who have attacked true religion throughout

---

3. Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 161; Sackur's edition of the "Libellus de ortu et de tempore Antichristi", 111; PL CXI.1295d - 1296a (see Appendix C, no. 3); cf. Haimo, PL CXVII.779d - 780b.

4. The eleventh and twelfth centuries produced at least seven different Latin versions of Adso's Letter: McGinn, Visions of the End, 34. The text of Adso's Letter has been edited by Ernst Sackur, "Epistola Adsonis ad Gerbergam reginam de ortu et tempore Antichristi", in: Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen, 97-113, and by D. Verhelst, ed., Adso Dervensis: De Ortu et Tempore Antichristi, CChrCM XLV. See McGinn, Visions of the End, 34-87, for the relevant passages in his translation.
history'. The 'German symbolists' of the eleventh and twelfth centuries were, in a sense, academic mystics, seeking a visionary grasp of the 'whole' of being, the Logos of the world: Rupert of Deutz (c.1070-1129) and Hildegard of Bingen (1098-1179) are archetypical representatives of this direction in German piety. The Antichrist is the theme of a mystical spirituality that places his 'mystery' in opposition to that of Christ. Topoi and images are the products of a symbolic thought that ingests and digests concrete phenomena in order to transmute them via symbols to the plane of a higher order of being."

In his commentary on Revelation, Rupert interprets enemies of the Church -- simoniacs, Jews, heretics -- as heads

---

179

7. McGinn, Visions of the End, 103. Trachtenberg takes no notice of this rather less hostile vision of Jewish participation in the Last Things.

8. On Rupert, see the study by John H. Van Engen, Rupert of Deutz (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983). Van Engen hardly mentions the Antichrist, even when he discusses Rupert's commentary on Revelation (275-282). According to Van Engen, Rupert "saw the Book of Apocalypse in much more ecclesiological than eschatological terms", with all the 'action' leading to the establishment of the Church as the Heavenly Jerusalem (281).

Hildegard does not cast the Jews as servants of the Antichrist; rather, after his destruction, Christ will 'call the Synagogue back, as David took back his first wife after the death of Saul': Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 524, citing the Scivias I.5: Scivias Wisse die Wege) nach dem Originaltext des illuminierten Rupertsberger Codex deutsch, ed. Maria Böckeler (Salzburg, 1954), 436.

of the dragon and members of the corpus diaboli (demonic corporation). Rupert understands the hypocritical 'false monks' tropologically as adherents of the Antichrist. Clerical abuses are signs of the approaching End Time.

Although Rupert follows Irenaeus, Jerome, Gregory the Great and Adso in stating that the Antichrist was prefigured in the tribe of Dan ('the serpent in the path'), he refuses to take this exegetical nostrum literally. Even though many 'authorities' see the Enemy as proceeding from this Jewish tribe, Rupert prefers a tropological interpretation. 'The Beast arising from the abyss' (Rev. 13) means a) he comes from the fiery depths of Hell, and b) the people from whom he comes are already in Hell."

Rupert applies the same thinking to Gog and Magog and the Jews. The former belong to the corpus Antichristi along with the Jews, all hypocrites, heretics and heathens. Nonetheless, he indulges in anti-Judaic exegesis that labels the Jews 'the sons of the Devil' and 'murderers' (of Christ)

---

8. Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 218, citing from Rupert, "In Genesim" IX,12 (PL CLXVII.357).

10. Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 227, citing Rupert's commentary on Revelation XI,20 (PL CLXIX.1184b). Rauh notes that this view echoes those of Bede (PL XCIII.95d), Haimo of Auxerre (PL CXVII.782b; 1093c; 101d), Berengaudus (PL XVII.970a) and Humbert, adversa simplices II,38 (MGH Libelli de lite I, 187) and the Glossa ordinaria, PL CXTIV.722c.
and sees in their opposition to the Gospel their support of the Antichrist. In the tradition of Jerome and Haimo, Rupert goes well beyond the Tyconian view of the abyss out of which the Beast will arise as Hell, adding "vel de profunda perfidia Judaeorum." Thus, the regnum carnalis Israel (the fleshly realm of Israel) is called the second head of the Antichrist; since the Incarnation, the Jews have been a collective Antichrist; conversely, they are actively awaiting the Antichrist. Even if the Jews are no worse than other enemies of God, and even though he does not believe the Antichrist will be a Jewish person, Rupert does associate the Jews with the Antichrist.

To Gerhoh of Reichersberg (1093-1169), there is a procession of Antichrists, enemies of the church characterized as simoniacs, avaricious careerists, schismatics and shameless

11. I.e., the Beast will arise from the abyss, or rather, from the unfathomable depths of Jewish treachery: Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 227-228, citing Haimo, "Expositio in Apocalypsim" IV, 13 (PL CXVII.1092c).

12. Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 228, citing Rupert’s "In Joannem" V (PL CLXIX.431d - 432a; CChrCM IX.193).

13. "Ergo cum dicit frater ille: Nunquam dedisti mihi haedum [a symbol of the synagogue], fatigatio subintelligitur populi Judaici, suspirantis quod nondum acceperit Antichristum." Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 228, citing Rupert’s "De S. Spiritu" VIII,16 (PL CLXVII.1301c-d). The Jews can have no better and no worse a role in the ranks of the Antichrist than heathens and heretics: the conversion of the Jews is more important than their serving the Antichrist (230).
ministers -- churchmen, mostly. Gerhoh is deeply indebted to Rupert of Deutz for his political apocalyptic critique. These enemies of the church will be followed by a final Antichrist, the 'dragon' of Revelation. His downfall will be accompanied by the destruction of his earthly ministers and servants, Gerhoh's chief concern.

5. The Personal Antichrist: Christian Visions

These political and moralized visions have little to do with the mainly vernacular late-medieval and early-modern renderings of the Antichrist that are the subject of this inquiry. Such texts brook no niggling Scriptural interference in their exegetical narratives and are not interested in symbolic or allegorical explanations of Gog and Magog as the 'body' of Antichrist. Here, in the tradition of the Tiburtine Sibyl, echoed by Adso and many others among the ranks of both the Latinate and the illiterate, the Antichrist is an historical person who will live, preach and reign on earth in a parody of Christ's human existence. This version, not the spiritualized allegory of high theology, was picked up by the

---

*McGinn, Visions of the End, 106-107, translating from De quarta vigilia noctis, ch. 16 (MGH, Libelli de lite, I, 522-523). Rauh's chapter on Gerhoh ('Gerhoch') is both an epitome of scholarship and a significant contribution in its own right: Das Bild des Antichrist, 416-474.
popular printing presses of the fifteenth century.\footnote{17} The Antichrist is a concrete individual who will interact with people on earth. Some will support him: the 'unclean peoples', Gog and Magog, the Jews, the 'Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander', the Red Jews, and the mass of unfortunates whom he 'deceives' and signs with his 'mark'. His enemies are those who resist him, the few believers, the remnant of Israel, Enoch and Elijah, the archangel Michael, or Christ himself. Dramatic scenes, not quaestiones and distinctiones, are the basic unit of this tale.\footnote{18}

\footnote{17} This tradition, which Emmerson calls 'standard and widely accepted', is but one of many views; the sixteenth-century Reformers would reject it entirely (see Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 204-237; esp. 215). Yet the concrete interpretation figures not only in the fifteenth-century Antichrist books, but also in the first printed edition of the Revelations of Pseudo-Methodius (Cologne, 1475) and in Wolfgang Ayntinger's Commentary on the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius (Johannes Froschauer published the first edition in 1496; Sebastian Brant produced an illustrated version in 1498 that had gone through seven more printings by 1576). The personal view co-existed with the Reformers' more political interpretation -- along the lines of Rupert's -- for many years.

\footnote{18} Such scenes are not limited to dramatic art. Pictorial art also represented the Antichrist as a concrete person supported by the Jews. In his dissertation "The Iconography of Antisemitism: A Study of the Representation of the Jews in the Visual Arts of Europe 1400-1600", 2 vols. (New York University, Institute of Fine Arts, 1973; available from University Microfilms International), Eric Zafran refers to illustrated medieval versions of the Book of Revelation in which "the Satanic manifestations or their adherents could be portrayed with the hats or badge characteristic of the Jews" (25). However, Zafran fails to place these works even within a particular century, citing only his source, the venerable Ulysse Robert, Les Signes d'infamie au moyen âge (Paris,
To most medieval Christians, the stage was a suitable place to depict religious events, even theological principles. The spectacular elements of the more 'literal' Antichrist tradition made for excellent drama. It has been suggested that a gradual change in Christian views of the Jewish role in the End Time occurred between the putatively 'less antisemitic' 12th century and the 'more antisemitic' 16th century. From necessary participants in the final conversion to Christ, the Jews came to be seen as servants and supporters of the Antichrist. The evidence cited for the twelfth 1891), 104.

"Again, there is a large literature on this subject. For a detailed examination of the Antichrist in the drama of the middle ages, Reformation and Counter-Reformation, see Klaus Aichele, Das Antichristdrama des Mittelalters, der Reformation und Gegenreformation (The Hague, 1974). Hans-Peter Kursawa focuses on the German literature of the middle ages only in his published doctoral dissertation Antichristsage, Weltende und Jüngstes Gericht in mittelalterlicher deutscher Dichtung (University of Cologne, 1976).

Selma Stern-Taubler, "Die Vorstellung vom Juden und vom Judentum in der Ideologie der Reformationszeit", in: Essays presented to Leo Baeck on the occasion of his eightieth birthday (London: East and West Library, 1954), 194-211; 207-208. A completely new understanding of 'the Jew' in the fifteenth century made Jews into apocalyptic figures who participated in the Final Things in a sinister fashion: they were 'schuld am Weltuntergang'. This development functions as the background to the treatment of the Jews during the Reformation era. A longer-term view is available from Klaus Geissler's lengthy discussion "Die Juden in mittelalterlichen Texten Deutschlands", in: Zeitschrift für bayerische Landesgeschichte 38,1 (1975), 163-226. Winfried Frey has made a more focussed contribution to the field in his article "Gottesmörder und Menschenfeinde", 44. The first to suggest this development, Trachtenberg cites the 'thirteenth-century' century certainly supports part of this argument: the popular Tegernsee Ludus paschali de adventu et interitu Antichristi (mid-twelfth century) was addressed to and reached a fairly broad audience, even including women, though as a Latin play it was nominally addressed to the lower clergy and their clerical social superiors." This well-known and much-imitated work has been called "the best literary product of German (sic: twelfth-century) Latin original of the medieval Antichrist plays, the Tegernsee Ludus paschalis de adventu et interitu Antichristi, which accords the Jews "a somewhat incidental role", since they convert only after the Antichrist has made large conquests; but later German and French versions, "following the popular disposition, display the Jews as prime movers in the drama": The Devil and the Jews, 36.

Karl Langosch, ed., Geistliche Spiele, Lateinische Dramen des Mittelalters mit deutschen Versen (Darmstadt, 1957), 179-241. Rauh describes the origins and context of this play at length in an entire chapter, 365-415. Rauh dates the work to the period between 1155 and 1161 (369). The play was well-known by 1161 or 1162, and was staged in southern German monasteries and perhaps even parish churches, as attested to by Gerhoh von Reiersberg's condemnation of clerics who, instead of devoting themselves to divine service, prefer to watch idle plays: "adeo ut ecclesias ipsas, videlicet orationum domus, in theatra commutent ac mimicis ludorum spectaculum impleant. Inter quae numirim spectacula, astantibus ac spectantibus ipsorum feminis, interdum et Antichristi" (cited by Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 368, from Gerhoh von Reiersberg, De investigatione Antichristi libri III, ed. F. Scheibelberger [Linz 1875]; MGH Libelli de lite III, ed. Ernst Sackur '1897', 305-395; I,3). Emmerson examines the play in considerable detail (Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 166-172). Recent editions of the play are Gerhard Günther's Der Antichrist: Der staufische Ludus de Antichristo (Hamburg 1970), including an extensive commentary, and a translation by John Wright, The Play of Antichrist (Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1967).
ecclesiastical life in the twelfth century." It borrowed from Adso, the Pseudo-Methodius, the Vulgate and the liturgy, but it shows no signs of a particularly antisemitic attitude. Only after he has conquered the Greeks, the French, the Germans, and finally the King of Babylon does the Antichrist send his apostles to the Jews to persuade them that he is their Messiah. The Jews are briefly deceived by the Antichrist, but convert to Christ after hearing the voice of the prophets. In the tradition of Otto of Freising, the 13 Geissler, "Juden in mittelalterlichen Texten", 203. Geissler notes that this text is also eminently political, 'the apotheosis of the imperial idea of the Staufen emperors' (202-203). This is the non-Tyconian position taken in the Elucidarium of Honorius Augustodunensis (+ after 1137) by the writer (or interpolator) of the passage on the Antichrist: the Antichrist is seen in 'medieval' terms as a human being, a tyrant, the renewer of Jerusalem, the Jewish false Messiah around whom the people of Israel will gather from all over the world. However, Enoch and Elijah will convert the Jews to Christianity. Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 253-254; 255, citing the Elucidarium III.10 (PL CLXXVII.1163c-d; ed. Y. Lefèvre, L'Elucidarium et les Lucidaires (Paris, 1954), 359-477; 453). The relatively mild tone of the Tegernsee Antichrist-play contrasts with the savage satire of the contemporaneous poet Walter of Châtillon:

"Miseranter miseror miseror Hebreos,
Qui verbis et opere se fatentur mecs;
Exspectant, ut veniam et reducam eos
Et rursus restituam Judea Judeos."

(Cited by Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 406, from Walther von Châtillon, Moralisch-satirische Gedichte, ed. K. Strecker [Heidelberg 1929], 142, Song XVI.12).

14 Cf. Rauh's chapter on Otto (c.1114-1158), the 'master of medieval world chronicles and the leading historian of German Symbolism' covers pages 102-165. So far as Otto was Ludus de Antichristo entirely lacks the 'Adsonian' motives that characterize the Antichrist as Jewish: his descent from the tribe of Dan, his circumcision, or the reconstruction of the Temple at Jerusalem. The author steers clear of all anti-Jewish polemic, which even Rupert had not been able to avoid. Jerusalem is displaced in a rather Augustinian moment by the 'Great City', the civitas diaboli (city of the Devil), as the 'home' of the Antichrist. The Synagogue is treated with dignity, indeed the Jews are cast as Antichrist's victims when after hearing Enoch and Elijah, they declare: "Seducti fuimus vere per Antichristum, / Qui mentitur esse se Judeorum Christum"."

The Latin ecclesiastical drama of this period is characterized by a singular consciousness that the Jews are necessary to the action and history of salvation, and that concerned, the Antichrist would deceive both Christians and Jews: Das Bild des Antichrist, 354.

". 'We were deceived by the Antichrist / Who lied, saying he was the Christ [Messiah] of the Jews': Rauh, Das Bild des Antichrist, 408, citing the Ludus de Antichristo II, 8 (Langosch 234). Rauh cites E.A.F. Michaelis' intriguing idea that the 'positive' view of the Synagogue is due to the influence of Bernard of Clairvaux, who intervened energetically against the persecution of the Jews, esp. in the Rhineland, at the time of the Second Crusade: "Zum Ludus de Antichristo". in: Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum 54 (1913), 61-87; 93.
they will convert at the end. However, the middle High German (and middle French) versions of this material would cast the Jews as evil, apocalyptic destroyers, especially in the period after the Black Death.

From the fourteenth to the sixteenth century, Antichrist plays depicted Jews not as the last, temporary subjects of the

---

17. Geissler, "Juden in mittelalterlichen Texten", 199-202. Geissler also maintains that courtly literature often shows a relatively tolerant, 'polite' attitude toward Jews (esp. the work of Wolfram von Eschenbach: 194-199), whereas the poets of the 'early bourgeoisie' start in the thirteenth century to take a tougher stand based on ancient ecclesiastical positions toward the Jews (199). Geissler argues that since there can be no question of 'antisemitism in the modern sense' existing in the middle ages (200), the hostility directed against Jews in vernacular literature of a less lofty sort was not a function of their different 'ethnicity' (Stammeszugehörigkeit), but of their different faith, since as outsiders under the protection of the authorities, they offered an easy target (201). See chapter 2 for a discussion of the terms 'antisemitism' and 'anti-Judaism'. Frey, "Gottesmörder", gives a brief summary of the Tegernsee Ludus de Antichristo on page 44 then contrasts it with the German Lucerne Antichrist-play of 1549, as the opposite extreme.

18. Geissler, "Juden in mittelalterlichen Texten", 202-204. 1348 was a 'turning point', according to Geissler (210). Vernacular translations of Latin texts were far more judenfeindlich (anti-Jewish) than the originals, Geissler notes (204). By the later middle ages, the Jews were no longer a necessary part of the history of salvation, but a projection into that sacred narrative of a contemporary Feindbild (stereotyped image of an enemy) (202). The anti-Judaic tendency of early 'clerical' (mostly Latin) plays, which sets in after the twelfth century, is outdone by what Geissler does not want to admit is antisemitism -- the all-encompassing hatred of Jews -- in the later medieval 'secular' (mostly vernacular) plays (e.g., the works of Folz and Gengenbach) (225).
Antichrist, but as his first and foremost adherents. The surviving directions for the 14th-century Frankfurt Passion Play betray a slightly different emphasis, but the Donaueschingen Passion Play assigns the Jews an equally evil role at the End.1

1. Frey leaps from the twelfth to the sixteenth century to illustrate the difference; yet he need have looked no farther than the late thirteenth century for evidence that the Antichrist would be supported by Jews: around 1260, Hugo Ripelin de Argentina brought out his Compendium theologicae veritatis (see infra in this chapter for a more detailed discussion). Frey, "Gottesmörder", 44-45. The sixteenth-century play is the German-language Antichrist-play of Lucerne, edited by Karl Reuschel, Die deutschen Weltgerichtsspiele des Mittelalters und der Reformationszeit. Eine literarhistorische Untersuchung, nebst dem Abdruck des Luzerner 'Antichrist' von 1549 (Leipzig 1906; =Teutonia, 4).

2. Frey, "Gottesmörder", 44. The elaborate stage directions (all that survives of this play) have been edited by Richard Froning, ed., "Die Frankfurter Dirigierrolle", in: Das Drama des Mittelalters. Die lateinischen Osterfeiern und ihre Entwicklung in Deutschland (Stuttgart. 1891-1892/reprint Darmstadt, 1964; = Deutsche National-Litteratur 14), 340-374. See Edith Wenzel, "Synagoge und Ecclesia. Zum Anti-Judaismus im deutschsprachigen Spiel des Mittelalters", in: Internationales Archiv für Sozialgeschichte der deutschen Literatur 12 (1987), 57-81; esp. 59-64; for the dating (before 1350), 61. Wenzel notes that the tone of this play, esp. in the formulaic disputation scene, is still moderate and fairly respectful of 'Synagoga', the 'elder sister' and regal opponent of now-triumphant 'Ecclesia' -- in keeping with what Wenzel describes as the more moderate tone vis-à-vis the Jews in pre-Plague Europe (61). See also Wolfgang F. Michael, Frühformen der deutschen Bühne (Berlin 1963; = Schriften der Gesellschaft für Theatergeschichte, 52), 26-35.

In comparison, the only extant medieval French Antichrist play, the Jour du Jugement (c. 1330), a more secular version of the apocalyptic material, was didactic in tone and much more antisemitic than its twelfth-century Latin predecessor. At the end of time, a devil will father a child on a whore at Babylon, a Jewess from the tribe of Dan. The child will be Antichrist. Emmerson notes that the speeches of the devils and of the mother "particularly emphasize that ... the mother is a Jew of the tribe of Dan". At the end, when Enoch and Elijah preach, the Jews -- traditionally the first to be converted by the prophets -- resist them, labelling them false prophets, traitors and hypocrites, finally killing them at the orders of Antichrist. Written just as the Jews were being expelled from France in stages by means of a series of edicts and counteredicts, this play supports the contention that the more secular and vernacular drama of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was markedly more hostile to the Jews than the ecclesiastical Latin drama of an earlier age.

1. Available in a fully-illustrated manuscript of the Bibliothèque municipale de Besançon (MS 579), it has been edited by Emile Roy, Le Jour du Jugement: Mystère français sur le Grand Schisme, Études sur le théâtre français au xiv° siècle (Paris: Emile Bouillon, 1902). I have relied on the description by Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 172-180.

2. Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 174.

3. Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 176-177.
The Chester Corpus Christi cycle (which includes sections called The Coming of Antichrist -- the only extant middle English Antichrist play -- and The Last Judgment) presents the Antichrist's life with very few characters and without the detail that the French and Latin plays lavished on him and his followers.\(^5\) The Jews are not singled out as the particular servants of Antichrist. However, the Antichrist does claim to be the Messiah promised by Moses, David and Isaiah. He does just what Christian exegetes had long been thinking he would do.\(^6\) Although the play was not representative, it did concur with mainstream Christianity in seeing the Jewish Messiah in the 'Christian', or rather, Jewish, Antichrist.

The view that attitudes toward the Jews changed and that they were cast in a new and sinister role in the entourage of the final enemy seems to be based on a selection of sources taken largely from a single genre, that of the drama

\(^6\) Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 181.
(including paschal passion plays and carnival plays, as well as less 'occasion-bound' works). Hugo Ripelin made it abundantly clear in the thirteenth century that the broad masses of the Jewish people (plebs iudaica) would be the especial supporters of Antichrist.

The 13th-century Franciscan preacher Berthold of Regensburg (c. 1210-1272) represents a much older view of the Jewish role at the End: Berthold argues (in the Augustinian tradition) that the Jews are to be tolerated for two reasons: 1) because they are living reminders of Christ’s Passion; 2) because any Jews who survive the Antichrist’s time will

---7---

... Nonetheless, the thesis is correct for a large body of influential literature. Trachtenberg cites the opinions of "Albertus Magnus" (sc. Hugo Ripelin) and Thomas Aquinas (1225-1274), who devoted considerable attention to the Antichrist legend, holding that Antichrist will be born in Babylon, of the tribe of Dan, will proceed to Jerusalem, where he will be circumcised, and will easily persuade the Jews that he is their long-awaited Messiah. He will then rebuild the temple, establish his throne there, and proclaim himself god. By means of miraculous deeds, bribes, and sheer force he will rapidly accumulate a vast army of adherents, but his power is destined to endure only three and a half years. God will then send Enoch and Elijah to raise an opposition against him, but he will overcome and slay them. Thereupon Christ will dispatch the archangel Michael to destroy him on the Mount of Olives." The Devil and the Jews, 34, cited from Preuß, Die Vorstellungen vom Antichrist, 11 ff. Trachtenberg claims that the popular view tended to follow that of the schoolmen, but included 'lush detail'; he does not mention that the schoolmen were following the well-known Sibylline and Pseudo-Methodian tradition, which is clear from a comparison of the above condensation with the texts cited above.
convert to Christianity before the Last Day. Bernard is much closer to Rupert of Deutz, Augustine and Jerome, a representative of the same 'moderate' position expressed in the Tegernsee Ludus de Antichristo.

The more popular, and probably more usual tradition cast the Jews in a markedly apocalyptic light, both in Latin theology and in vernacular exegetical and literary works, and well before the putative divide of the Black Death. In his Historia scholastica (c.1165), Peter Comestor made the definitive identification of the apocalyptic destroyers of biblical and literary lore 'Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' with the Jewish ten lost tribes -- at approximately the same time as the Tegernsee play came into being. The previous two chapters have traced the influence of the Comestorine conflation and the many further elaborations accorded it, especially in vernacular German literature, until the fifteenth century. Berthold of Regensburg, who was not known for friendly feelings toward the Jews, evinced a

---

"Frey, "Gottesmörder", 18: The second reason: "Unde durch ein ander sache: swaz ir den endekrist überlebt, die werdent vor dem jungsten tage alle ze kristenliuten" cited from Franz Pfeiffer, ed., Berthold von Regensburg. Vollständige Ausgabe seiner Predigten mit Anmerkungen (Vienna, 1862-1880/Reprint Berlin, 1965; =Deutsche Neudrucke, Texte des Mittelalters), 1, 163. The vicious tone of the sermons in general must also be considered: the Talmud is "allez sament ketzerie, unde dà stêt só verfluochtiu ketzerie an, daz daz übel ist daz sie lebent." (vol. 1, 101): 'heresy through and through, and there is such damnable heresy in it that it is sickening that they are allowed to live'.
'cautious' attitude toward their final role in the history of salvation. However, his Dominican contemporary Hugo Ripelin of Strasbourg, whose work would exert a decisive influence on later-medieval ideas concerning the Antichrist and the Jews, had a very different view, based at least in part on the ancient traditions of the Tiburtine Sibyl and the Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius.

Hugo's Compendium theologicorum veritatis followed the Tiburtine/Adsonian tradition concerning the descent of the Antichrist, who was to be born of the Jewish tribe of Dan. He would claim to be the Jewish Messiah, and the Jewish people would be his special and foremost adherents. He was not

---

"This was the most widespread basic sketch of scholastic theology in the later middle ages and Reformation era. It went through almost 40 printings, and owed much of its medieval vogue to the fact that it was greatly indebted to Bonaventure's 'Spreiloquium' and to the works of Albert the Great; indeed, it was generally mistaken for the work of one or the other (Burger, "Endzeiterwartungen", 21, esp. note 8). For a complete listing and investigation of the manuscript and printed tradition, see Georg Steer's monumental study, Hugo Ripelin von Straßburg. Zur Rezeptions- und Wirkungsgeschichte des 'Compendium theologicorum veritatis' im deutschen Spätmittelalter (Tübingen, 1981). For the passages from the Compendium concerning the Antichrist, see Appendix C, no. 4.

"'[Antichristus] nascetur autem in babilone de tribu Dan, sicut dicit glossa super apocalypsim. Post hoc veniet in hierusalem, et circumcidet se dicens iudeis se esse christum illis promissum. Unde plebs iudaica specialiter adherebit illi, sicut dicit Haymo super Apocalypsim." For the full text of this passage and notes, see Appendix C, no. 4. Trachtenberg cites numerous examples of this hostile and polemical imputation -- in which anti-Judaic and antisemitic motives are inseparable --, even dating it to "the early Christian era", although he does not cite a source. An eleventh-century above inventing sources for this assertion." His thinking on the Antichrist is concrete and personal, whereas the Glossa ordinaria he carelessly cites calls the Beast of Rev. 13,1, "in a spiritual sense the Antichrist, or generally the entire number of the wicked."^{2}

Ramón Lull (ca. 1235-1315) inveighs against the Jews for awaiting a Messiah who is a man, not God, and who will liberate them from their physical and political captivity. But their captivity is their sinfulness, and since the arrival of a mere man cannot remove their sins (as Christ could), the Jews are therefore in error." This does not suggest that the formula of renunciation of Judaism required the convert to anathematize 'all those who hope for the coming of the Messiah, or rather of the Antichrist': The Devil and the Jews, 12. Toward the end of the thirteenth century, the Tortosa Jewry oath required a Jew to swear "per mesias qui es dit Antecrist, lo cual vosaltres esperats" ('by the Messiah, who is called the Antichrist, for whom you people are waiting'); cited in The Devil and the Jews, note 2 to chapter 2 (224), from José Amador de los Rios, Historia social, política y religiosa de los Judíos de España y Portugal (Madrid, 1875-76), three vols.; vol. 1, 572.

^{1}. See notes to the Latin text, Appendix C, number 4.

^{2}. Glossa ordinaria, PL CXIV.733b: "'Et vidi' etc. Bestia spiritualiter est Antichristus, vel generaliter tota collectio malorum." This view is shared by Hugh of St. Cher (Appendix B, no. 17) and Hugo a Novo Castro (Appendix B, no. 26).

^{3}. "Item iudei sunt in captivitate christianorum et sarracenorum, ut patet experientia, et dicunt quod sunt in captivitate propter peccatum, et sic sequitur quod illi qui sunt mortui in peccato, sum peccatum sit causa captivitatis eorum, et sic sunt damnati. Iudei spectant Messiam, et dicunt ipsum esse nominem, et non Deum, et desiderant suum advantum ut eos eliciat a captivitate, et siquidem prodest eis illius
Messiah awaited by the Jews is the Antichrist, but it leaves room for such an interpretation. Rather, Lull deplores the concrete, personal idea of the Jewish Messiah. Their captivity is the result of sin, not merely of physical exile. Here, a 'spiritual' Christian exegete condemns 'fleshly' Jewish belief, although much of Christian tradition concerning the Antichrist is itself 'fleshly'. Perhaps Lull would have argued that Adso, Hugo and their successors had been contaminated by Jewish ideas.

Although Hugo may have consulted a different version of the Ordinary Gloss on the Bible, the difference between his almost 'hagiographic' description of the Antichrist and the moralizing method of the Gloss, echoed by Lull's critique of Jewish Messianic hopes, is striking: this is the same divide as that which separates the personal Antichrist depicted in the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl, the Revelationes of the Pseudo-Methodius, Adso's Letter, the Antichrist passage in the Elucidarium of Honorius Augustodunensis, Comestor, Hugo adventus qui sunt mortui in captivitate et in peccato, cum suus adventus non removeat peccatum; concluditur ergo quod Iudei sunt in errore ..." José Maria Millás Vallicrosa, ed., El "Liber predicationis contra Judeos" (Madrid/Barcelona 1957), 100; 16th Sermon Against the Jews, lines 23-31.

\[1\]

\[2\] See Karl Froehlich and Margaret T. Gibson, Biblia Latina cum Glossa Ordinaria. Introduction to the Facsimile Reprint of the Editio Princeps Adolph Rusch of Strasbourg 1480/81 (Turnhout: Brepols 1992) for a thorough discussion of the variants available in the middle ages, their sources, editors, manuscript and printed editions.
Ripelin,\textsuperscript{4} and most of the middle High German texts cited in the preceding chapters, from the spiritualizing tendencies of Tyconius, Jerome and Augustine, Rupert of Deutz, Gerhoh von Reighersberg, the Ordinary Gloss, Hugh of St. Cher and Hugo a Novo Castro. The concrete reality of the Antichrist and of his Jewish servants (the Ten Tribes, the Red Jews, or merely the Jewish people) is part of an historical, perhaps even 'secular'\textsuperscript{4} version of the history of salvation. This version has little in common with the moralizing and allegorical theological position that could still allow the Jews a relatively innocuous role in the Eschaton. These authors avoid any precise identification of the Antichrist and his forces, and insist on the conversion of the Jews. This last prediction might be called 'historical' as opposed to 'allegorical', but in fact, the role the Jews play in this well-known scenario is perfectly in keeping with their typological function as branches broken from the good olive tree, onto which the new branches of Christianity have been grafted (Romans 11,17-24). The broken branches (the Jews) must be re-grafted onto the original tree (by conversion) to fulfil the prophecies.

\textsuperscript{4} Hugo does offer as an alternative explanation the views of Augustine and Jerome; but his late-medieval reception tended not to get beyond the idea that he mentions first, namely that Gog and Magog are the Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander the Great beyond the Caspian Mountains.

\textsuperscript{4} By 'secular', I mean an understanding that remains within the human time-frame.
concerning the deliverance of Israel. For all the anti-Judaic sentiment of the Pauline certainty that the Jews will convert, it is the less hostile of these visions of the end.

The Tegernsee Antichrist play and the views of Bernard of Clairvaux represent a variant position that incorporates elements of those just sketched: Antichrist is a real person, but the Jews are not his particular servants. Bernard and the Tegernsee Ludus de Antichristo are in accord with anti-Judaic religious views that looked backward to the crucifixion and forward to the final conversion. This less-hostile view of the Jews’ function at the end did not disappear, but it was drowned out during the later Middle Ages, at least in the majority of Latin and vernacular treatments. The more popular and usual antisemitic identification of Jews with the forces of evil at the end of time is based on legends, literature and exegesis both in the vernacular and in Latin, which feature a straightforward and concrete depiction of such personages as the Antichrist or the Red Jews. The moralizing, allegorizing interpretations that looked to Scriptural and patristic authority for information to make sense of the world did not find a place in the majority of late-medieval sources, which mined the Bible and Fathers for citations that could be used to plate their position in the armor of authority.
6. The German Antichrist: Vernacular and Latin Sources from the Holy Roman Empire

A series of Latin and vernacular texts that associate the Antichrist with Jews -- of whatever kind -- can be traced from late antiquity to the end of the Middle Ages. In the following pages, passages from medieval Latin and middle High German exegetical texts (many of which have been discussed in the last two chapters) that circulated in the German-speaking lands and that feature an historical Antichrist attended by Jews are passed in review. The object of this survey is to prepare for a discussion of fifteenth-century apocalyptic texts that specifically link the Antichrist and the Jews, including the Red Jews. Texts we have already discussed from the perspective of the information they provide about the forgotten Red Jews will now be considered from the perspective of what they have to say about the Antichrist and his Red Jewish servants.

A. The Red Jews and Antichrist

Heinrich of Neustadt combines in his Von Gottes Zukunft (c. 1300) the details of the Antichrist story (familiar from the Tiburtine Sibyl and Hugo Ripelin's Compendium) with the Alexander legend (including the ancient story of the Amazons)

---

7. See chapter IV for a discussion centering on the Red Jews, and Appendix A, no. 3, for the middle High German text and my English translation. and the specifically German tale of the Red Jews. This precise mix will occur again, in the 15th-century Antichrist books. A similar concoction (except for the 'German' Red Jews) can be found in Afonso de Espina's Fortalicium fidelium and such texts as Pamphilus Gengenbach's 1517 play Der Nollhart. According to Heinrich's version, when the Antichrist arises to conquer the earth, he sends for Gog and Magog and the Red Jews, 'evil peoples' "who must serve my power: God has granted this to me". The Red Jews are merely a part of Heinrich's excursus on the Antichrist and the last days. He notes at the end of the passage that the Jews will convert and there will be no telling Jews from Gentiles. The conversion prophecy finds its way into personal Antichrist narratives as well.

---

". First printed 1471; see below in this chapter for details and a more thorough treatment.

". "Die bose diet" of line 5856 refers to "Die roden Ju'den, daz volg Gog, / Amazones und Magog, / Und waz der himel hat bedaht, / Daz mu'z diinen miner maht: / Das hat Got mir gegeben": see Appendix A, number 3, lines 5856 and 5550-5554, respectively.
The middle High German version of the Passau Anonymous (c. 1330) pushes the identification of the Antichrist, the Red Jews and the Jewish Messiah even farther. "The Jews and many Judaizing Christians" imagine that this people [the Red Jews] is holy: they would be glad if they were to come, and would join their ranks immediately." These Jews, who are also called the Red Jews" are the focus of the passage; they are kept locked up by God's might only until the time of the Antichrist, when they will be let loose.

Thus, not only is the Messiah awaited by the Jews none other than the Antichrist, but Gog and Magog (who will accompany the Antichrist) are the Red Jews -- and thus identical with the Ten Tribes awaited by 'the Jews and Judaizing Christians' as a 'holy people', their deliverers.' This underlines the parallel between seeing the Jewish Messiah

---

1. A reference to Jerome, Commentaria in Ezechielum, XI, 38 (PL XXV.372c - 373a; CChr LXXV.525, 1476-1482; 526, 1497-1500); see Appendix B, no. 6 for full text of passage. Jerome says the Jews and Judaizing Christians believe Gog to be the numberless Scyths "beyond the Caucasus, by the Caspian Sea". Jerome disagrees, arguing that the Apocalypse of John is to be understood in a mystical sense, and that Gog and Magog are "all the perverse and evil enemies of the church".

2. "Nun wenend die juden vnd ettlich jüdisch kristen, das selb volk syend hailig lüt vnd sechend gern, wenne sy komen, wann si kerend zehant in ir schar." (lines 40-43). For the full text of the passage and an English translation, see Appendix A, number 4.

3. For a more detailed discussion of this belief, see section VII of this chapter.
as the Antichrist and seeing the Ten Tribes as apocalyptic destroyers, the Red Jews. In both cases, a Jewish belief that had a significant influence on Christianity is interpreted in terms of the distorted images medieval Christians formed of its original content.

The middle Low German sielen trost (ca. 1370) tells nearly the same story as Hugo Ripelin, with the notable addition of the 'Red Jews, who are enclosed' (by Alexander)." However, the Antichrist says not that he is the Messiah of the Jews, but Christ, God's son. The Red Jews 'follow' (serve) him, rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem, worship him as a god, say he is Christ and that 'our Lord Jesus Christ' was the Antichrist: therefore the Antichrist is the Messiah of the Red Jews. In the middle High German and early modern German versions (Der Grosse Seelentrost), he is the Messiah of the Jews.

In the 14th/15th-century translation of the Gesta Romanorum," the Red Jews are identified as the 'Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander'. The passage concentrates on the Alexander story. The reference to the Antichrist is almost

"1. See chapter IV for the discussion of the Red Jews and Appendix A, no. 7 for the full text of the passage and my translation.

"2. Gesta Romanorum, Das ist der Roemer Tat; see chapter IV and Appendix A, number 8 for this passage in middle High German and an English translation.
incidental: "When this same people [the Red Jews] breaks out with their Antichrist and martyrs the people [Christians], he [God] will do great signs." The Antichrist is peculiar to the Red Jews ('their Antichrist'), and the focus is clearly on this 'evil people'. It would seem as though the Antichrist were mentioned merely to authenticate the apocalyptic 'credentials' of the Red Jews. But the Apocalypse can hardly be imagined without the Antichrist. Here is a decidedly 'popular' shift in emphasis based on strong anti-Jewish sentiment that is less immediate to Revelation than to the menace of the Red Jews. This is also the most extreme form of association between Antichrist and the Red Jews: he is 'theirs', their Messiah.

One version of the middle High German Historiated Bible⁷ (14th/15th century) also tells the story of the Antichrist in a variation very close to that offered by Hugo Ripelin. The Antichrist is born of the tribe of Dan in Babylon; he will be circumcised in order to pose as the Jewish Messiah, and all the Jews will hasten to him; he will send out twelve apostles and seventy-two disciples to preach his message. The

⁷. "Wann daz selb volk chumt mit irem antichrist auz und marternt die lêut so tuot er groissers zaichen durch seinen willen." (lines 23-25).

⁸. Die mittelhochdeutschen Historienbibeln, Family I, "Dō got in siner wagenkraft" (vol. 2), 487-488: see Appendix B, no. 28 for full passage and translation.
dénoeulment is as expected.

The most striking exemplar of this tradition is the German Antichrist 'blockbook'. First printed around 1450 in a transitional format, in which the images are woodcut prints and the text hand-written, the chiroxylographic Antichrist of c.1450 is not merely an unicum, it is an unique testimonial from the dawn of Western printing to the urgency and popularity of this theme. The oldest surviving manuscript dates to 1430. There are eight manuscripts extant. A xylographic edition (text and images are woodcuts: Nuremberg 1472) and a number of typographically printed editions (e.g., the Strasbourg Antichrist of 1480 with woodcut illustrations) are also known. An English edition, published by the astute businessman Wynkyn de Worde, begins with the words The Byrth and Lyfe of the Moost False and Deceytfull Antechryste. This version appeared around 1520. It was based on an edition

---

9. Another fifteenth-century xylographic version, undated and without place of publication, can be added to the list: Zndtkrist. Hie hebet sich ann von dem Entkrist (title incomplete), 27 sheets in-folio; and another undated typographic edition, without place of publication, of 20 sheets, also in-folio. Another edition came out at Strasbourg in-quarto, published by Hupuff, undated; there is also a late Erfurt edition by Hans Maler (Maller), in-quarto, typographic, of 1516: Theodor Oswald Weigel, Verzeichnis der Xylographischen Bücher des XV. Jahrhunderts (Leipzig, 1856), 5.
published as early as 1505, and was derived at least in part from the German Antichrist-books, though it does not mention the Red Jews." The Jews, however, are intimately involved in the career of the Antichrist in this version as well. The late fifteenth-century French\(^2\) and Spanish\(^4\) lives of Antichrist are not unimportant, but they also are derived in large part from the earlier German Antichrist-books. The paucity of surviving editions and the isolation of these texts, compared to the proliferation of Antichrist material in German, justify the narrower focus chosen here.

More important than these details of publishing are the

1. The other sources of the English text are the Livre de Auctorites de Saintes Docteurs: Touchant de L'Advenement et du mauvais Antechrist (sic) (Lyons 1495) and The Coming of Antichrist, included in The Art to Live Well and Die Well (London: Wynkyn de Worde, 1505). See Joseph M. Ricke’s Ph.D. thesis "The Antichrist Vita at the End of the Middle Ages: An Edition of The Bryth and Lyfe of the Moost False and Deceytfull Antechryst" (Houston: Rice University, 1982), available through University Microfilms International. Ricke’s edition is a transcription of the sole surviving print, preserved at Cambridge University Library, Syn. 7.52.17.

2. L'Advenement de l'Antechrist (Paris: Antoine Verard, 1492), in-folio, typographic; later printed with several other works to form L'Art de Bien Vivre et de Bien Mourir (Paris, Antoine Verard, 1493); the Livre de Auctorites de Saintes Docteurs: Touchant de l'Advenement et du Mauvais Antechrist (sic) (Lyon, 1495); La vie du mauvais Antechrist (Lyon, 1499, in-folio; and Antwerp, 1560, in-octo, typographic). Contemporary Latin editions included De Antichristo auctoritas sanctorum doctorum (Milan, 1496), in-folio, and De turpissima conceptione, nativitate et alii praesag. diab. illius pessimi homimum antichristi (Paris: Le Noir, undated), in-quarto, typographic. See Weigel, Verzeichnis, 5-7.

3. Libro del Antichristo (Saragossa 1496); typographic.
form and content of the text. On fol. 5, plate 'a' of Antichrist 1480, the Antichrist is shown being circumcised at Jerusalem. He announces to the Jews that he is "the Messiah promised them, for whom they have waited for so long, as the Compendium says."

In 5b, "the Jews begin to rebuild the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, which had been destroyed long ago by the Roman emperors Titus and Vespasian. The Jews say that their God has arrived."

Antichrist calls himself the 'true Messiah' and 'true God on earth'.

On fol. 11a, "the Antichrist has the Jews mark on the forehead and on the right hand as a sign that they believe in him, as is written in the Apocalypse of John in the Compendium."

As noted in

"Der wor messias" and "worer got uff erden": Antichrist 1480, 12b and 11a.

"Der Enndkrist heysset die juden bezeichen an die stiern. Und uff die rechten hand/zu' einem zeichen das sy an in glouben. das stet geschrieben in Appocalipsi johannis in Compendio septimo": Antichrist 1480, 11a. Here the sealing of the servants of God (Rev. 7: 1-17), who are twelve thousand of each of the twelve tribes of Israel (i.e., including the ten 'lost' tribes) with a sign on the forehead is confused with chapter IV, the Antichrist sends out his 'apostles' to preach and convert the world to him. One of these messengers preaches to the Queen of the Amazons and the Red Jews; "these same Jews will break out at the time of the Antichrist." The connection between the Red Jews and the Antichrist is not just their simultaneous appearance: the Red Jews break out in order to join the Antichrist after he has manifested himself at Jerusalem for the battle against Christendom. Like the Jews who rebuild the Temple (another detail from the Compendium, see Antichrist 1480, 5b), the military Red Jews are his particular followers.

The illustration to 13b depicts a 'false apostle' preaching to the Queen of the Amazons, a lady-in-waiting, and a bearded male figure bearing a scepter and girded with a sword. He is not wearing a Jew's hat, but his beard and the content of the caption make it clear that he is one of the Red the sealing of the servants of the Beast on the right hand or forehead (Rev 13,16-18); the confusion will continue with the repetition of the sealing of the servants of Antichrist in 16b and 17b. The source used by the author is not the Apocalypse of St. John, but Hugo's Compendium, as the text indicates: "et omnes suo caracterre signari in manu dextra, et in frontibus suis sicut habet Apocalypsim 13[,17]": see Appendix C, no. 4 for the full passage from the Compendium. This confusion reflects the current belief that the Jews will be the servants of Antichrist, not the suggestion in Rev. 7 that the servants of God will consist of all twelve tribes of Israel; it would have been improbable had the author been well-versed in the Vulgate. He generally cites Scripture via the Compendium, which suggests that he was not consulting the Bible.

". See Appendix D, no. 5a.
Jews. Armed and bearing a regal scepter, he represents the threatening paradox of a military Jewish kingdom. To medieval Christians, this was a role-reversal, a Verkehrung in the sense of ‘the world turned upside-down’, both unthinkable and absurd except in this apocalyptic context. Next, the ‘pilgrimage’ or ingathering (czúzug) to the Antichrist from all over the world and of all kings begins. "First of all, the Red Jews break out and cause the world great suffering. These same Jews are called Goq and Magog and their ten tribes" (14b). There can be no doubt as to the apocalyptic credentials of the Red Jews when they are called Goq and Magog.

The Red Jews then march to Jerusalem to champion the Antichrist. The illustration to 14b” depicts a king, a queen, a lady of high fashion, and two Jews, all on horseback. One Jew appears to be carrying a small round shield, i.e., he too is armed -- a contravention of canon law. In the illustration to 15b, the Antichrist takes gold coins from a tray held by a demon and hands them to his followers, who are marked on the forehead with his sign. They are a woman, a turbaned figure (a Turk or a Jew) and two figures whose dress and headgear

From servants of God sealed with a mark on the forehead (Rev. 7), the Ten Tribes have become servants of Antichrist: medieval tradition filters Scripture.

See Appendix D, no. 5b.
indicate that they are Jews.

Written in German without complex citations, the Antichrist-book was a work of popular exegesis. Not faithfulness to Scripture, but received wisdom, 'common knowledge', current beliefs concerning the Last Things\(^1\) and attitudes to the Jews among the nobility, urban merchants and guildsmen -- in all likelihood, the early audience of this 'limited and time-consuming printing'\(^2\) -- were the standard of interpretation and truth. Above all, what was 'current' turns out to be what was sanctioned by the rich medieval tradition examined in the preceding pages and chapters. The putative German-speaking audience seem to have had some demands as concerns authority: the author cites as a main source Hugo Ripelin's Compendium.

As we have seen, the author of the Antichrist-book was

\(^1\) A contemporary (mid-fifteenth-century) Flemish block-book also depicts apocalyptic figures as Jews: the locusts from the bottomless pit (Rev. 9,3-11) appear much as they are described in Revelation, but instead of a crown of gold, their heads sport Jew's hats: Zafran, Iconography of Antisemitism, vol. I, 26, citing Heinrich Theodor Musper, Die Urausgaben der holländischen Apokalypse und Biblia Pauperum, 3 vols. (Munich, 1961); Zafran reproduces this illustration in vol. 2, plate 53.

\(^2\) The printing runs in the fifteenth century were still very modest, compared even to the edition sizes of the Reformation era. In the 1470s, 100-200 copies of a book were commonly printed, and in the 1480s, printings of 400-500 were average; some reached 1,000 or more: Lucien Febvre and Henri-Jean Martin, The Coming of the Book. The Impact of Printing 1450-1800, trans. David Gerard (London: NLB, 1976), 217-218.
not overly concerned to ensure that the interpretations he proposed conformed exactly to Scripture; 'close enough' seems to have been 'good enough'. Other authorities (e.g., Fathers and Doctors of the Church) were often held to be sufficient proof, but in this text, authorities are cited without regard for precise meaning. An incorrect reference to Jerome in a critical passage proves that medieval, not patristic tradition, and legendary, not theological authority were the central pillars of the mental edifice revealed here: the text of Antichrist 1480, 13", reads "And another emissary of the Antichrist preaches to the Queen of the Amazons and to the Red Jews whom king Alexander enclosed in the Caspian Mountains. These Jews will break out at the time of the Antichrist as St. Jerome writes." As noted above, Jerome's point in his commentary on Ezekiel is that Gog and Magog are not particular peoples whose identity can be got at by means of clever etymologies, which he calls "vanity and a baseless science of names". In the Antichrist-books as in their source, Hugo's Compendium, an appeal to authority (Jerome and

"For Jerome's actual words, see Appendix B, no. 5, lines 23ff.

"Jerome wrote concerning Gog and Magog only, as the Ten Tribes would not be confused with them (as they are here under the name Red Jews) until the twelfth century.

"Appendix B, no. 5, line 39: 'superbia et falsi nominis scientia'" the Gloss, respectively) actually masks the opposite of the 'canonical' position: because that which everyone knows (i.e., the medieval tradition) must be the truth -- as witnessed to by the Fathers (Jerome) and the Church (the Ordinary Gloss)!

The author selectively interprets Jerome's comments on the matter through the medium of standard medieval beliefs concerning the Last Things. He has no trouble perceiving in the mysterious nations that Jerome and the Bible called Gog and Magog the imaginary medieval reality which he and his contemporaries knew as the Red Jews.

This tells us a good deal about the unidentified author, and allows us to draw a parallel to Hugo Ripelin. In this kind of question, common knowledge was a better guide to the truth than dusty tomes. Authorities had to be cited, but citations were filtered through what was already known, so that they were understood to say what the communis opinio wanted to hear. And we know something more about the readers, whose demand resulted in at least eight manuscripts and three 'printings'. If they did have access to Jerome, they did not distinguish between the Biblical destroyers he mentions and the imaginary, constructed people they knew from the medieval tradition. In all likelihood, they could not read Jerome, who warned not to identify Gog and Magog with a particular nation.

None of the surviving prints of the Antichrist-book has any marginalia that would suggest otherwise -- i.e., that they could or did read Jerome and incorporate his reservations.

All the elements that had accumulated since the time of Hugo Ripelin are included in a text of which Christoph Peter Burger has said "it does not attempt to establish any sort of order" (in the many traditions it cites). That is the whole point: Hugo, the tradition of the Von Gottes Zukunft or the Passau Anonymous, and anything else handy went into this fascinating congeries. The appended work called the 'Fifteen Signs preceding the Last Judgment' was generally attributed to Jerome; in this case, it was drawn largely from the version included in the Legenda aurea of Jacob a Voragine (1228/30-1298). In medieval texts, the Fifteen Signs traditionally follow the death of the Antichrist. Logic and system are foreign to the tradition, to the author(s) and redactors and

~ Burger, "Endzeiterwartungen", 18.

This is the case in Hugo a Novo Castro's Tractatus de victoria Christi contra Antichristum (2.10) and in most fifteenth-century illustrated lives of the Antichrist, including the Old French De l'avenement Antechrist and the Middle English Cursor Mundi: Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 83-84. Burger does not mention the revealing pre-history of association between the Fifteen Signs and the life of Antichrist. On the Fifteen Signs, see William Heist, The Fifteen Signs Before Doomsday (East Lansing, MI: Michigan State College Press, 1952). One of the earliest versions is the "De quindecim signis" of Pseudo-Bede, PL XCIV.555 (England, 3th century); see also Georg Nölle, "Die Legende von den Fünfzehn Zeichen vor dem Jüngsten Gerichte", in: Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 5 (1874), 413-476.
to the audience of the Antichrist-book. The German readership of this popular text would not have been interested in systematic, logical, orderly exposition.\(^{a}\) What was supposed to be there, according to tradition, was there.

B. Antichrist or Messiah

Ulrich von Pottenstein (+1420), the court chaplain (Hofkaplan) at Vienna to Archduke Albrecht IV,\(^{10}\) belonged to the vanguard of a clerical circle including Stephan von Landskron, Heinrich von Langenstein and Johannes Nider that valued vernacular preaching and exegetical writing highly enough to engage in both, composing some of the first serious

\[^{a}\] Burger is consternated by what must appear to him as a logical contradiction: it is said that the Antichrist will be born in 'a city called the Great Babylon' of the tribe of Dan (an element from the Sibylline tradition). However, this must happen before the Red Jews break out of their mountain prison, Burger objects. The Red Jews are the Ten Tribes, of which Dan is one. This is an element of a separate but equally authoritative medieval tradition that also has roots in antiquity. Burger looks to the Compendium for help in explaining these contradictions ("diese Unstimmigkeiten ... aufklären"), but gets no help because Hugo on this point, at least, is tuned to another frequency -- that of Augustine and Jerome, who both refuse to see in Gog and Magog any specific peoples, much less the Ten Tribes ("Endzeiterwartungen", 47-48). These two parallel and related, but unharmonized medieval traditions receive equal weight as they are woven seamlessly into a narrative that might seem illogical or naïve. We ought to be able to look beyond such terms to the structures underlying such compilation: not credulity, but deference to tradition and a pragmatic taste for concrete detail (cf. Leonardo Olschki, "Der Brief des Presbyters Johannes", 5) are behind these Unstimmigkeiten.

\[^{10}\] For information on Ulrich, see the Verfasserlexikon, III (old series: 1943), 918-923 (entry by F. Ranke).
and sophisticated theological treatises in the German language a century before Luther chose the language of the 'common man in the street' as a reference point for his famous Bible translation and his theological pamphlets in German. In the foreword to his 'Catechism', a volume intended for 'pious and intelligent layfolk' (frummen und verstanden layen), Ulrich distances himself from the clumsy word-for-word German translations (aygen dewtsch) from the Latin that had been usual, and describes and defends his use of the common language spoken around him as the appropriate means of communicating with the non-Latinate majority. In his

"And take note that I ought to have translated many Scriptural passages included in the book word-for-word, rather than in the German I have used. I have taken the common run of the German language as it is spoken here [in this country] as my reference-point, because this book and the teaching it contains are well-suited to the task of preaching to the common folk. 'Aigne dewtsch', which places the words in the same order as in Latin, is neither suitable nor useful for this purpose. For paraphrases are more useful for the common folk at many points in Scripture than the aygnew dewtsch which the learned understand, but in such a way that the true meaning is not changed by paraphrasing." "Auch ist czu merkken, daz ich vil der schrifft, die ich in dem puch gesezzeit hab, vil paz hette mügen czu ainer aygen dewtsch bringen denn die dewtsch ist, die ich gesezzt hab. Nu hab ich den gemainen lauf dewtscher sprach nach des landes gewohnheit für mich genomen; wann daz puch und die lere, die darinnen begriffen sein, schikchen sich gemainchlich, wie man die lere predigen schülle vor dem volkhe. Darczu mag sich an allen steten aine dewtsch nach der latein, als die lawtst und nact dem text liget, weder geschikchen noch gefügen. Wann umbred bringen an maniger stat in der schrifft mer núcches vor dem gemainen volkch denn aygnew dewtsch als daz die gelerten wissen, ýedoch also, das die warhait des sinnes mit umbred icht verrucket werde."; Vienna, Österreichische National-commentary on the Ten Commandments, written around 1406, Ulrich devotes some pages to the theme of the 'Christ' (Messiah) whom some Jews claim was born when Vespasian destroyed the Temple, and who is biding his time until the appointed hour arrives, when God will send him forth to liberate the Jews. In a section that is essentially a translation from Nicholas of Lyra's Bible postilla, Ulrich discusses the supposed whereabouts of this false Messiah, the Jewish 'Christ', and says we ought to put the question to the Jews:

"So they should be asked where Christ is, and where he has been for so long a time. Many of them [the Jews] will respond that he is with the angels living as Moses did, who lived forty days on Mount Sinai, and is waiting until the Lord orders him to reveal himself. Others say that he is on the other side of the mountains that are called the Caspian Mountains, waiting there in the same way for the bibliothek, Cod. 1050, f"; cited from Thomas Hohmann, Heinrichs von Langenstein 'Unterscheidung der Geister' Lateinisch und Deutsch. Texte und Untersuchungen zu Übersetzungslehre aus der Wiener Schule (Munich, 1977), 261.

"The work in which this commentary is found treats the Magnificat and the Ten Commandments. The manuscript is at the Széchenyi National Library, Budapest, FM1 2495. Mr. Robert Bast drew my attention to this important representative of early vernacular catechesis and kindly loaned me his microfilm copy of the manuscript.

"Christians charged that since the scepter shall not pass from Judah until the Messiah comes (Gen. 49.10) and the Jews lost their kingdom under Vespasian, the Messiah must have come before that time -- namely Jesus. The explanation presented here is that the true Messiah was born at the time of the destruction of the Temple (i.e., before the scepter passed from Judah), and is waiting 'in reserve'."
Lord’s orders to come at the time when this people [the Jews] is to be redeemed."

The false Christ awaited by the Jews is rumored -- according to 'some Jews' -- to be on the other side of the Caspian Mountains: where the Red Jews/Ten Tribes are. It is not surprising that the false Messiah should be located among the Jews who will help him when the Lord orders him to come forth and deliver the Jews of the Diaspora. Ulrich charges the Jews with making up stories; that the Jews cannot agree as to their Messiah’s whereabouts proves that the story is entirely fictitious. Already we sense some of the sceptical flavor of anti-Judaic apology that becomes the main theme of treatments of the Red Jews in the Reformation. The evidence provided by Ulrich is negative, not positive: he imputes to the Jews the erroneous belief that their Messiah is waiting somewhere beyond the fabled Caspian Mountains, a belief that corresponds closely to ideas common among the German-speaking population of the Empire concerning the Red Jews. Ulrich concurs with Lyra and pillories this notion as absurd.

The Fortalicium fidei ('Fortress of Faith') of Alphonsus a Spina (Alfonso de Espina, bishop of Orense -1469), which appeared in at least seven editions in Germany between 1471 and 1525, is praised by Burger for offering an example of 'a considerably more logical [better-harmonized] version [of this story] than the captions of the Antichrist-book'. Espina has the Queen of the Amazons, in the Alexander novel merely a neighbor of the 'enclosed peoples', guard (in conjunction with the Great Khan of Cathay) the 'sons of Israel'\(^7\) who were enclosed by Alexander between two camps or fortresses (castra) called 'guth' and 'maguth'\(^8\).

---

⁶⁶* "Eine wesentlich harmonisiertere Version als der Bildertext bietet Alphonsus a Spina in seinem Forotalicium fidei, der 'Festung des Glaubens'...": Endzeiterwartungen, 30. The Fortalicium fidei contra fidei christianae hostes was first printed at Strasbourg by Johann Mentelin in 1471 (Hain 372). At least six further editions appeared over the next fifty years: Basel (1475), Nuremberg (1485), Lyon (1487), Nuremberg (1494), Lyon (1511 and 1525). For the relevant passage, see Appendix C, no. 7."

These enclosed Jews\(^9\) are endowed with the horrible characteristics of the 'unclean peoples': "like wild beasts, they live on raw meat, biting into living people, and on the fruits of trees".\(^\text{10}\) When the Antichrist appears, they will join him and accompany him to Jerusalem, where he will reign as a mighty king "by virtue of their support".\(^\text{11}\) Then all the other Jews dispersed throughout the world (i.e., the descendants of Benjamin and Judah) will gather at Jerusalem. The Antichrist will be circumcised and claim to be the Christ promised the Jews in their Law. He will say that 'our Lord

\(^7\) The "filii israel" are the Ten Tribes; Appendix C, no. 7, fol. 145\(^*\), col. 2, line 17.

\(^8\) These are historical distortions of Gog and Magog, Gog having been interpreted as 'Goths' -- for which Augustine was indirectly responsible -- and which were common in the Romance versions of the Alexander story. Again, the reference to Comestor ("magister hystoriarum") is not accurate. Espina is conjuring with a respectable locus, but Comestor says nothing of the sort.

\(^9\) They are not called the Ten Tribes, but simply filii Israel.

\(^10\) This is what I make of the phrase "nudi incedentes carnibus crudis et arborum fructibus vivunt" (Appendix C, no. 7, fol. 145\(^*\), col. 2, lines 26-27).

\(^11\) That is, "virtute quorum regnabit et erit monarcha potentissimus" (Appendix C, no. 7, fol. 145\(^*\), col. 2, lines 37-38).
Jesus' was a great deceiver and a magus. For our present purpose, the heart of this portion is as follows:

"And all the Jews, deceived by wondrous signs and drawn by promises, will come pouring in to Jerusalem and cleave to him, for they burn with an excessive desire for the Coming of their Messiah, by whom they hope to be delivered from their captivity. And since they will see him in the flush of prosperity, radiant with glory, subjugating other kings, they -- who have long been blinded by their false beliefs -- will accept him as the true Messiah, and will worship him as a god, and they will fear and respect him as their lord and king."

The Jews are the first and foremost servants and supporters of the Antichrist. The 'enclosed Jews' are his power base, and 'all the Jews' of the Diaspora become his subjects as well. His reign is based on their support; they in turn see in him the Messiah promised them in their Law.

---

12. Cf. the 14th-century sielen tröst, Appendix A, no. 7.

13. For the Latin text, see Appendix C, no. 7, fol. 145, col. 2, line 38 - fol. 146', col. 1, line 2).

14. The Compendium de vita antichristi, published anonymously in 1475, contains the same detail: "Concerning the cult of the Antichrist there are four points. The first is that in order to attract the Jews to himself, he calls himself the Messiah promised to them in the Law, true God and true man, and he will rebuild the temple of Solomon. ..." (See Appendix C, no. 8, lines 5-9 for the Latin text).

15. Espina here launches into a discussion of whether the Antichrist will reign in the Temple (in templo) at Jerusalem, as some -- or rather, 'some others' -- say, or whether he will reign as the Temple (in templum), i.e. the Church: such that the Antichrist will be a falsus christianus and claim to be a man of the Church. This is the beginning of the thread that can be spun into a yarn like the 'Papal Antichrist' so favored by Luther in later years.
Espina expressly cites the blind error of the Jews as a justification for their apocalyptic destiny. Anti-Judaic religious positions, antisemitic literary traditions and apocalyptic expectation coalesce here to form a particularly lucid vision of Jewish participation in the destructive reign of the Antichrist. Between the moralizing, allegorizing position of 'high theology' (which in this case always means Jerome and Augustine, cited in some variation) and the solidly traditional, unsophisticated encyclopedism of our vernacular texts, Espina occupies a middle ground, providing contemporary and subsequent Latinate readers of 'applied theology' with what would become -- during the decades of especially vigorous antisemitic agitation that followed -- a popular and well-harmonized guidebook to the 'Jewish peril' in the Last Days.

The Künzelsau Corpus Christi cycle (c. 1479) displays prominently the demonic associations of the Antichrist (when he is born, a devil informs Lucifer that "our comrade" is born), and emphasizes Antichrist's Jewish support. The Jews become his most faithful adherents after Archsinagogal identifies him as the Messiah and asks that he take revenge against the Christians on behalf of the Jews. This last \[16\] This work "particularly plays up Antichrist's devilish connections and his close association with the Jews": Emmerson, Antichrist in the Middle Ages, 165. See Peter Liebenow, ed., Das Künzelsauer Fronleichnamsspiel (Berlin, 1969), lines 5075-5304.

detail corresponds to the terrifying apocalyptic function of the Red Jews.

In Hans Folz' late fifteenth-century *Ein Spil von dem Herzogen von Burgund*¹ and Pamphilius Gengenbach's Der Vollhart (1517),¹² two vernacular plays not associated with particular religious holidays, the Antichrist is depicted as the Jewish Messiah -- or at least the Jews believe that the Antichrist, when he appears, is the Messiah they have been waiting for. Of this venomous and highly revealing pair of plays, the former is by far the more savage in construction and tone.¹³ Not the real Antichrist, but an impostor put up

¹⁷. A. von Keller, ed. Fastnachtsspiele aus dem fünfzehnten Jahrhundert, vol. I (Stuttgart, 1853; =BLVS, 28; reprint 1965), 169-190. See Appendix C, no. 9, for the relevant passages and an English translation. Folz (1450-1515), a barber, Meistersinger, writer of carnival plays and a thorough-going Jew-hater, dedicated this coarse work to the 'Duke of Burgundy' -- since 1482, Philip the Fair (1478-1506), son of Maximilian I (1459-1519) of the house of Habsburg.
According to one Folz specialist, the present work was composed between 1486 and 1494: see Hanns Fischer, "Hans Folz.
Altes und Neues zur Geschichte seines Lebens und seiner Schriften", in: Zeitschrift für Deutsches Altertum 95 (1966), 212-236; 225. Concerning Folz and his other works, see the Verfasserlexikon, vol. 2 (Berlin, 1980), cols. 769-793, Edith Wenzel, "Zur Judenproblematik bei Hans Folz", in: Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie 101 (1982), 79-104.

¹². An extract from this play and an English translation are in Appendix C, no. 10.

¹³. Trachtenberg discusses this play briefly, then generalizes concerning the Antichrist plays: "the effect of these plays upon the passions of the mob may be gauged from the action of the Frankfort City Council, in 1469, establishing special regulations for the protection of the Jewish quarter during the period when the play was being to the job by some rabbis appears at the court of the Duke of Burgundy, demanding that all Christians pay homage to him and hand over worldly power (authority, lordship and government\(^{39}\)) to the Jews. This pitiful ruse is discovered and mocked by the Christian characters, especially the violent Fool. After the 'false Messiah' or Endcrist is revealed as an impostor, he explains that the reason for this desperate deceit was that the Jews had been expecting the Messiah to come and save them for fourteen hundred years; since he still had not arrived, they decided to hurry things along. The Jews are then tortured in an unspeakably savage and degrading fashion. The play ends with the men of the Duke dancing with glee around the mutilated corpses of the Jews.

The Spill von dem Herzogen von Burgund was written at the time of the strongest efforts by the Nuremberg city council to persuade Emperor Maximilian I to allow the city to expel the Jews. The Jews were expelled from Nuremberg in 1499. The city council had been bickering with the Emperor since their decision in 1473 to eject one of the largest and most prosperous Jewish communities in Europe. The Nuremberg citizen Hans Folz depicted the Messiah awaited by the Jews as the \(^{39}\) The Devil and the Jews, 17. That the Spill von dem Herzogen von Burgund was written after 1469 does not detract from his point.

---

\(^{39}\) "Gewalt, herschaft und regiment": Appendix C, no. 9, p. 171, line 30.
Antichrist in other works as well: between 1483 and 1488, Folz published a poem in rhyming couplets (Reimpaardichtung) called Der falsche Messias. Here, a young student seduces a Jewish maiden and makes her pregnant. To save his skin, he tricks the girl's parents into believing the awaited child is their Messiah. However, the baby turns out to be female. The student is exposed as a seducer, but the Jews are held up to ridicule as fools. This theme had been used by Caesarius of Heisterbach (c.1180-c.1240) in his Dialogus miraculorum. Folz' work was supported by members of the Nuremberg patriciate, among whom he found an audience appreciative of his antisemitic tirades. The humiliation and torments suggested in this popular carnival farce on the theme of the world turned upside-down (unsuccessfully, of course) mirror contemporary expulsions from the German towns, Spain and Portugal. In the case of Nuremberg, the Spil von dem Herzogen von Burgund was part of a concerted, long-term campaign on the part of the city council and ruling elite, supported by such middling citizens as Hans Folz, to rid the city of Jews. No Jew held citizenship at Nuremberg from 1499 to 1850.\textsuperscript{123}

---

In Der Nollhart, a friar and a Jew dispute the issue of the Messiah. The friar insists that Jesus was the Messiah, citing the usual Biblical loci, then at the request of the Jew, describes the Antichrist. The device used is a version of the comedic confusion of persons: the Jew thinks that the Christian means by 'Antichrist' the Jewish Messiah; the Christian thinks the Jew means by 'Messiah' the Antichrist of Christian lore. In fact, the Christian author imputes to the Jews the absurd (but among Christians, long-standing) belief that the Jewish Messiah will be the Antichrist. The Jew asks the friar to describe Antichrist (i.e., in Jewish terms, the Messiah), as the Jews have been waiting for him for fifteen hundred years, and are anxious that he arrive soon. The friar says the Antichrist will be born of the tribe of Dan, 'as was Judas, who is eternally damned', then recites the by-now familiar details of his birth and early career. After the Antichrist arises, the friar explains that \textsuperscript{3} Edith Wenzel, "Zur Judenproblematik bei Hans Folz", 103. See also Phillip N. Bebb, "Jewish Policy in Sixteenth Century Nürnberg", in: Occasional Papers of the American Society for Reformation Research (1977), ed. R.C. Walton, 125-136. Bebb ascribes the push to rid the city of its Jews to the rapid growth of both population and the money supply, which caused a "widenin bifurcation between prices and wages. The consequent inflation produced severe economic problems for Nürnberg's council and its subjects. Thus it is likely that the city regarded the Jews as the cause of these problems and sought a remedy in expulsion." (126-127) The wave of similar expulsions at this time is not mentioned.

\footnotesize

Gog and Magog, whom Alexander enclosed,
Will be let loose:
They will cause great misery in Christendom
And create much pain and suffering.
And the Queen of the Amazons will also
Come to him with many Jews:
Who think their Messiah is on earth:
They will be delighted indeed.
At this time he will work many signs [wonders]
With which he will deceive people.

The Jew:
O friar, say no more;
I wish he would come tomorrow
Because we have been waiting for him for so long.

Although this version of the Antichrist story is less clear than, say, Alfonso de Espina, or even than the Antichrist-books, as to which Jews will support the Antichrist and in what order, the Antichrist is to be attended by the Queen of the Amazons and by "many Jews who think their Messiah is on earth". The Jew’s response to the friar’s description of the coming disaster is meant to evoke scorn as well as fear: "I wish he would come tomorrow." This text confuses the Jewish Messiah with the Antichrist as thoroughly as the Spil von dem Herzogen von Burgund had done in the previous generation.

Another genre confirms that the identification of the Jewish Messiah with the Antichrist was well known in the later Middle Ages. The painter Hieronymus Bosch, or van Aken, (c. 1460-1516) depicted the Jewish Messiah as the Antichrist in 25. See Appendix C, no. 10, fol. 411v, lines 21-34 for the German text.

---

many of his works, including the Prado Epiphany.\textsuperscript{126}

Messianic hopes were nothing new to European Jewry, nor were they confined to this period, as I have demonstrated in chapter II. Intense Jewish and Christian speculation concerning the final things coincided in this decisive period for Christian-Jewish relations. Each side would seem to have fed off and confirmed each other. From the early Middle Ages to the early sixteenth century, there was a fascinating coincidence of expectations concerning the Antichrist-Red Jews-Enclosed Jews (on the Christian side) and the Messiah-Ten Tribes (on the Jewish side). Christian apocalypticism -- and especially the Antichrist legend -- must be seen both in the context of received antisemitic belief and in the context of Jewish messianic expectations.

7. Conclusion

Jewish Messianism fulfilled an apologetic and a polemical function vis-à-vis Christian doctrine, for expecting a Messiah implied that none had yet arrived. What better way, then, for Christians to attack the Jewish denial of Jesus' messianic credentials than to depict the Messiah awaited by the Jews as the personification of final evil? The argument then runs as follows: not only did the Jews in their 'blindness' deny and kill Christ the Messiah, but, far worse, they see in the evil figure known to centuries of Christian apocalyptic as the Antichrist none other than their Redeemer! Therefore, they must be in league with him and the forces of evil -- not a surprising conclusion if one assumes the Jews are evil in the first place. The demonization of the Jews in other spheres (e.g., concerning their appearance, rituals or supposed odor17) cannot be separated from the demonic role ascribed to the savage, 'unclean' (unrein) Jews in the End Time ever since Comestor's conflation. Christian apocalypticism, especially in the popular, vernacular realm (mirrored in the Antichrist books, the Spil von dem Herzogen von Burgund and the Nollhart) cannot be separated from an antisemitism rooted just as firmly in 'demonizing' ethnic hatred and suspicion as in antagonism to Jewish messianic beliefs.18

In the 15th century, not only vernacular drama, but vernacular and Latin popular exegesis associated the Jews very closely with the Antichrist as his first and foremost servants. This popular association was not new; it appeared in the work of Hugo Ripelin -- "piebs iudaica specialiter adherebit illi" -- around a century after the appearance of 17. Cf. Trachtenberg, The Devil and the Jews; see pages 47-50 on the alleged 'Jewish stench', the foetor judaicus.

---

the Tegernsee Antichrist-play, which was 'still' innocent of this defamatory belief, came into being. Indeed, most Latin and vernacular authors held at least from the time of Peter Comestor that Jews of some description would play a prominent role in the onslaught of the Antichrist during the last days. At the same time, Jewish messianic hopes created an atmosphere of alert expectation among the Jewish communities of Europe. Rumors circulated constantly that the Ten Tribes, imagined by Jews as their liberators from Christian bondage, had crossed the Sambation and were on the march. These rumors delighted Jews -- but alarmed Christians.

The antisemitic depiction of the Jews as minions of Antichrist was in Langmuir's sense 'irrational', based on no observed or observable phenomena, and was to that extent 'chimeric' -- yet it was tradition, the tales of centuries, including the immensely popular Pseudo-Methodius and Alexander materials, that made it possible for vernacular exegesis (Von Gottes Zukunft) and a churchman like Hugo Ripelin to share similar ideas concerning Antichrist and the Jews. Tradition, indeed, is the factor that makes it impossible to apply Langmuir's concept 'chimeria' -- fantasies with no possible basis in anything real -- to the role of the Jews at the end of time. This role did not spring into being all at once, as the result of a psychological aberration. It developed over centuries as stories, speculation and conflation took on the appearance of solid fact by virtue of repetition and confirmation through the generations, each forming a basis of authority for its descendents.

---

29. To Comestor and his imitators, the Ten Tribes.

In German-language texts of the 14th and 15th centuries, the especially threatening Red Jews were among the first to be assigned to the ranks of the Antichrist. First the Jews, then the Red Jews were servants of Antichrist. The part assigned to the Red Jews in the final drama was a 'step up' in the 'escalation of antisemitism' that included canon law restrictions, accusations of sacrilege and ritual murder, suspicions of a diabolical role in the entourage of Antichrist, expulsion and forced conversion. The re-assignment of the Jews from 'conversion duty' to active service in the army of the Antichrist had occurred by the time Hugo Ripelin wrote his theological encyclopedia; it took fifty years more for the idea to start showing up in other genres, after which time it became a commonplace of antisemitic Christian apocalyptic.
VI: A MEDIEVAL LEGEND IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY: PIOUS AND POLITICAL PERMUTATIONS

There are two reasons to pay particular attention to the legend of the Red Jews in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century German sources. The first is that over this span, the legend continues to change in important ways that reflect broader developments. In 1523, 1562 and 1596, the Red Jews appear in popular pamphlets in new and surprising roles. The second is that after the sixteenth century, the phrase disappears from Germany and is confined to eastern European Jewish folklore, after which time it haunts Christian Europe from the outside. This antisemitic term, and the savage people it originally depicted, have disappeared from scholarly vocabularies and textbooks precisely because they belong to the Middle Ages, and generations of scholars (at least since Burckhardt) have been reluctant to allow much to spill over from what until recently were called nonchalantly the 'Dark Ages' into the 'modern' era. The Red Jews haunted the sixteenth century from the inside, from within the medieval convolute of myths, legends, tales and popular beliefs that by no means disappeared at the first signs of the Renaissance and Reformation.

This chapter offers both positive proof (the witness of pamphlet and other vernacular sources) and negative evidence (the condemnation and dismissal of the Red Jews as a 'foolish fable' by influential and learned churchmen) of the wide diffusion and popular nature of the legend of the Red Jews in 'early-modern' Germany.

1. Apocalyptic Anxiety

Since at least the middle of the fifteenth century, a groundswell of interest in the approaching End had produced a large number of apocalyptic works and prophecies in both Latin and the European vernaculars. In the German-speaking lands, the tradition of the Red Jews occupied a prominent place in late-medieval speculation and learning about the End Time. The Antichrist was featured in a series of block-books and early typographical printings that document the widespread and lasting appeal of this story among German-speaking audiences. Interest in the last things was not exhausted by this vernacular rendition of the Antichrist legend; authoritative apocalyptic sources in Latin were in demand among those who could read them. Among the most important of these were the ancient Revelationes of Pseudo-Methodius, an edition of which was printed at Cologne as early as 1475. Wolfgang Aytinger (c.1460–after 1508) had Johannes Froschauer publish his Commentary on Methodius in 1496, and in 1498, Sebastian Brant produced an illustrated version that was to be very popular in the following century, running to seven more printings by 1576 (the illustrations included Gog and Magog being enclosed by Alexander, and breaking out of their mountain fastness at the end of time). According to Aytinger, the beginning of the End was the fall of Constantinople (1453); the conclusion would come in 1509, when he predicted the Last Emperor would triumph over the Turks. The continuing editions attest to the enormous popularity of this Latin work in the early sixteenth century.

---

See especially the Antichrist books, treated in chapter V.

2. A new Christian twist on an old Jewish legend

In 1508, the Jewish convert to Christianity Victor von Carben (1422-1515) published his Judenbüchlein at Cologne, a \[\text{\footnotesize 4 a and b. They are from Michael Furter's 1498 Basel edition. For a reproduction of the plate showing Gog and Magog breaking out of the Caspian Mountains, see also Cary, The Medieval Alexander, 131.} \]

\[\text{\footnotesize 5. McGinn, Visions of the End, 271.} \]

\[\text{\footnotesize 4. Juden Büchlein. Hyerinne würt gelesen, wie Herr Victor von Carben, welcher eyn Rabi der Juden gewesst ist, zu Christlichem glauben kommen. Printed in 1550 (no place of publishing noted) as a reprint of the 1508 Cologne edition. See Panzer, Annalen der älteren deutschen Litteratur, I (Nuremberg 1788/reprint Hildesheim 1961), 291. There is an almost word-for-word Latin edition prepared by Ortwin Gratius, the Opus aureum ac novum et a doctibus viris diu expectatum. This edition was printed at Cologne by Heinrich of Neuß (Henricus de Nuscia), February 1509. Book I of the Opus aureum was also appended, under the title De vita et moribus Iudeorum Victoris de Carben olim iudei nunc Christi miseratione Christiani Libellus, to an edition of Ricoldus a Montecrucis (Ricold de Montecroix), Contra sectam Mahumeticam non indignus} \] work that described the conditions and customs of the Jews with a view to aiding in their conversion. It was reprinted at Cologne in 1550. Victor was no mere puppet or mouthpiece for the Dominicans of Cologne, an accusation often levelled at his contemporary and fellow proselyte Johannes Pfefferkorn.

scit libellus, printed at Paris by H. Stephanus in 1511. I have consulted this latter edition, in which Victor's work is on pages 63r-86v; Wolfenbüttel 151.51 Th.(3). The 1550 edition was edited, according to Panzer, by Michael Kromer, pastor of Kunitz, and contains his 1523 pamphlet popularization of Luther's Daß unser Herr Jhesus Christus..., called Eyn Underredung vom Glauben, durch Herr Micheln Kromer ... und einem Judischen Rabien, mit namen Jacob von Brucks, discussed in chapter 6. The original printing of 1508 is very rare. There is a copy at NIC (Rare BT 1120.K18), probably printed at Cologne by Heinrich Quentel Erben in 1508. This version differs slightly in orthography from that owned by Panzer, who also possessed other printings. The British Library possesses an undated copy of the same work Panzer consulted, which is dated "1510?" in its catalogue (1412. e. 19.), but 1508 by Panzer. There are numerous printings of the 1550 edition: BSB Astr.p.84p, Beibd.1. (also at British Library 1351. a. 13. (2.)); BSB Polem. 1425; and that mentioned by Panzer (not an exhaustive listing). Panzer notes that although the 1511 Latin version is not a word-for-word translation of the 1508 German edition, it treats the same material. The 1550 edition is the same, except for the division of chapters, as the 1508 version. For the relevant passages from these works and my translations, see Appendix A, nos. 12 and 13.

See Hans-Martin Kirn, Das Bild vom Juden im Deutschland des frühen 16. Jahrhunderts, dargestellt an den Schriften Johannes Pfefferkorns (Tübingen, 1989; =Texts and Studies in Medieval and Early Modern Judaism, 3), esp. insofar as the Latin versions of Pfefferkorn's works are concerned: 186-188. Heinrich Graetz goes so far as to state that Gratius
Both Victor and Pfefferkorn belonged to the Dominican circle that included humanists such as Ortwin Gratius, Arnold van Tongeren and Jacob von Hoogstraten, with whom these converts plotted to suppress or eliminate Hebrew books. Gratius wrote section headings for and may have translated into Latin some was the author of Pfefferkorn's Der Joeden spiegel (Cologne 1507; in Latin, the Speculum adhortationis iudaice ad Christum, Speyer: Conrad Hist, 1507; see Kirn, Das Bild vom Juden, 201 ff. for further details concerning Pfefferkorn's works and their translations) in his History of the Jews, IV (Philadelphia: The Jewish Publication Society, 1894/1949), 425. James V. Mehl notes in his dissertation "Ortwin Gratius: Cologne Humanist" (University of Missouri-Columbia, 1975), which he kindly made available to me, that there is no evidence to substantiate such claims (95, note 61). There is solid proof that Johannes Pfefferkorn died before 1531: in entry 123, dated Friday, 17 February 1531, in the minutes of the Cologne City Council, it is noted that the son of the late Johannes Pfefferkorn was to be imprisoned: "Der Sohn des verstorbenen Johannes Pfefferkorn soll zu Turm gebracht werden." Beschlüsse des Rates der Stadt Köln 1320-1550, vol. 4 (1531-1540), ed. Manfred Groten (Düsseldorf, 1988; =Publikationen der Gesellschaft für Rheinische Geschichtskunde LXV), 15 (fol. 93, F).

Gratius praised both Pfefferkorn and Victor as learned men. In a letter to Arnold Tongern, he called Pfefferkorn one of the learned Jews who "have risen up against their own race in an amazing conflict" and converted to the Christian faith: in Pfefferkorn's Quomodo Judei suum pascha servent, fol. A1: "...contra suum genus mira quadam contentione insurgunt." In a dedication to Bishop Theoderic of Cyrene, Gratius described Victor as having "courageous temperament, painstaking diligence, and cultivated as well as diverse learning"; in Victor's Opus aureum (Cologne 1509), fol A2: "...erectum ingenium, operosam diligentiam, politam atque multiplicem doctrinam...". Gratius was at pains to persuade Christian readers of the orthodoxy and qualifications of these converts to write on the Christian faith. These passages and translations are cited from James Mehl, "Ortwin Gratius: Cologne Humanist", 97 and notes 69 and 70.
of the polemical and missionary German pamphlets by Pfefferkorn and Victor. Victor disputed with learned Jews before the Archbishop of Cologne at Bonn, and secured the expulsion of the Jews from Brühl, Deutz and other towns in the area: the protocol is to be found in Victor’s Opus aureum ac novum (1509). Victor also was named as a member of a commission of inquiry into supposed oalaspheies against the Christian religion. These insults were said to be contained in the Jewish books Pfefferkorn had confiscated at Frankfurt on Friday, September 28th, 1509. Further confiscations were carried out at Mainz, Bingen, Lorch, Lahnstein and Deutz. This commission was to be established by Johannes Pfefferkorn on the strength of the second mandate he obtained from the

The texts in question are Pfefferkorn’s Quomodo Judei suum pascha servent (in disem buechlein vindet yr ein entlichen furtrag wie die blinden Juden yr Ostern halten, published at Cologne by Johannes Landen in 1509). The Latin version was published at Cologne by Heinrich of Neuß (Henricus de Nuscia) in February of 1509 and the Hostis Iudeorum (Ich bin ein buehlein Der JUden veindt ist mein namen...; Cologne: Johannes Landen, 1509), published by Heinrich of Neuß in March of 1509. Gratius’s translation of Victor’s Judenbüchlein, the Opus aureum, was also published by Heinrich of Neuß, in February of 1509. James Mehl claims Gratius did the translating, although there is no scholarly consensus on this question: "Ortwin Gratius: Cologne Humanist", 94 and 95, esp. note 62. Kirn points out that many of the Latin translations of Pfefferkorn’s and Victor’s work expanded and commented on the original text. Kirn also notes that there is no certain evidence that Gratius translated any of the early writings of these two proselytes. Kirn, Das Bild vom Juden, 186.

Emperor, dated Roverdo, 10 November, 1509. Doctors from the universities of Cologne, Mainz, Heidelberg and Erfurt were to examine these books in the presence of Jewish scholars. The commission was also to include "Jacob von Hochstraten of the Dominicans, doctor-of-law and grand inquisitor; the most learned Johannes Reuchlin, doctor-of-law, well grounded and versed in Hebrew writings, and Victor von Carben, formerly a Rabbi and now a priest", under the charge and supervision of Pfefferkorn.\(^\text{10}\)

Victor was a late and to all appearances a sincere convert.\(^\text{11}\) As Pfefferkorn did, he tried to persuade Christians that mistreating Jews would not encourage their conversion to Christianity. He was certain, however, that the Jews are blind to the 'true faith' and in frightful error; his tone is often acerbic. He hacks away at Jewish messianic hopes with a well-known, but also well-worn saw of Christian missionary argument when he reminds the Jews that they have no royal power left on earth -- which must mean that the Messiah has come, according to Jacob's promise that God will not allow the 'scepter' to fall away from Judah until the Messiah appears. Victor reports that when Jews are told this, they reply that there are Jewish kingdoms left on earth, therefore the 'scepter' has not yet fallen from 'Judah'. They have a king

\(^{10}\) S.A. Hirsch, "John Pfefferkorn and the Battle of the Books", in: The Jewish Quarterly Review IV (1892; original series published in London), 256-288; 269. The meeting was not convened, and a third imperial mandate restored the books to their Jewish owners after a bitter public feud in which the city council of Frankfurt ultimately sided with the Jews, citing their ancient and customary privileges and Pfefferkorn's interference in areas of council jurisdiction (270).

\(^{11}\) Salo W. Baron attempts to explain the conversion of Pfefferkorn and Victor as follows: "In that stormy period of growing internal unrest in the Empire, the successive regional expulsion of the Jews, and Jewish disillusionment over the pseudo-messiah Asher Lammlein, a few Jewish intellectuals threw up their hands in despair and joined the dominant faith.": A Social and Religious History of the Jews XIII, 185.

12. "If you ask a Jew, young or old, 'In whom do you place your trust, you Jews, that you are so stubborn and arrogant, even though you see very well that your kingship and temple are long past, given that there is no poorer and more God-forsaken people in the whole world than you?' They answer and say: 'We still have a king and leaders in another country. So you ask: 'Where and in which country are they? I have visited many lands and have never heard of any kingdom or jurisdiction that you can or might still claim.' Judenbüchlein (1550), Book I, ch. xviii (19), fol. Diii; see Appendix A, no. 12 for the German text with my translation. The promise is made by Jacob in his blessing: "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, /Nor a lawgiver from between his feet, /Until Shiloh come;/And unto him shall the gathering of the people be." (Gen. 49,10). Cf. Peter Schwartz (Petrus Niger), Der Stern Meschiach (Eßlingen: Conradus Feyner 1477), Staats-bibliothek zu Berlin - Preußischer Kulturbesitz 3° Inc.1138, tr.1, fol. 48b ff: Schwartz reports that the Jews claim still to have mischpat, i.e. jurisdiction over life and death ("das gericht des pluotes") somewhere in the east, across the Red Sea. This is similar to the tales reported by Victor von Carben and Antonius Margaritha, but lacks the term Red Jews, which they took from the German legend. It is possible that 'blood justice' has something to do with Red Jews, but the term appears nowhere else in the literature. The Red Sea is a more common motif in connection with the Ten Tribes, yet entirely absent from any text that actually mentions Red Jews. Shiloh washes his clothes in wine, and his eyes are redder than wine (Gen. 49,11-12), but this motif is never mentioned in connection with the Red Jews.
"the other side of Babylon in the Caspian Mountains, who is from the tribe of Judah. These same Jews are the Red Jews and mighty powerful they are too. There are more of them than there are Christians in all of Christendom, as many more as you are now more than us."[1]

The Red Jews are the ten lost tribes, who will come to the aid of the Jews in the Diaspora, and free them from their servitude under the Christians. We encounter here a further 'conflation' or confusion, which fuses the ancient and independent Jewish tradition of the Ten Tribes beyond the Sambation (or Sabbathion) with the German Christian story of the Red Jews. Victor avows that he had travelled far and wide and read much, yet never heard either of such a kingdom or of such a people. Although he is a hostile witness, his report reveals another version in which Christians received the story of the Red Jews in the sixteenth century. Victor's Jewish interlocutor claims that even as they speak, 600,000 Red Jews are on their way to liberate Jerusalem by the sword. [4] The justification given by 'the Jews' for so high an estimate is that ten tribes were exiled to the east, whereas all the Jews in the west were descended from the remaining two tribes (Benjamin and Judah): therefore, the Red Jews (Ten Tribes)

[1]. See Appendix A, no. 12, fol. D iiiii', lines 17-23.

[4]. Ibid., fol. Tvii', lines 6-10. This number was not chosen at random. It is the number of the men of Israel who left Egypt (Exodus 12,38). It crops up again in the 1523 pamphlets, and is echoed in the 900,000 men of the 1596 pamphlets.
must be many hundreds of thousands strong. Among other details in Victor’s report, this biblical number appears again in the 1523 pamphlets -- but as a shocking reality, not an absurd exaggeration.

In the Latin translation of Victor’s Judenbüchlein, the section dealing with the Red Jews follows the German original almost word-for-word:

"Then, if you ask him [a Jew] back, in what part of the world they have kings and princes, dominions and kingdoms, concerning which principalities and dominions nothing certain has ever been discovered, he will answer: 'Beyond Babylon in the east, in the Caspian Mountains, is our king, who is descended from the true line of Judah. And those whom he commands are also called genuine Jews [margin: Myth of the Red Jews] and are now called in the vernacular tongue the red and most mighty Jews, who are far more numerous than all Christians combined'."

The attribute red, uncommented in most texts, has here elicited an addition from the translator to the effect that the Red Jews are extremely strong, robustissimi, a term that

---

3. The Latin version is called the Opus aureum ac novum in its original 1509 version, and the De vita et moribus Iudeorum Victoris de Carben olim iudei nunc Christi miseracione Christiani Libellus in a partial reprint of 1511.

evokes the hardiness of military vigor -- not the sallow, disarmed Jewish scholars, moneylenders and merchants of European -- and National Socialist -- stereotype. The marginal note alerts the reader that this story is fictitious. The learned translator feels compelled to explain the term: these Red Jews are 'red', ruddy with health, because they are robustissimi. This text provides firm proof that at this time, as in the high and later Middle Ages, the Red Jews belonged to the realm of vernacular culture. When they intruded into learned Latin, their designation had to be labelled as a vernacular term and explained by means of a descriptive adjective that made immediate, concrete sense of a vernacular term. The designation Red Jews, it would seem, did not convey to this Latinate translator the tradition-sanctioned authority and the exotic, frightening connotations current in the high and later medieval tradition.

The De vita et moribus Iudeorum is the only known Latin source that contains anything more about the Red Jews than their name. An Latin translation of a German text -- in a nice reversal of the medieval paradigm we have already observed --, this mention of the Red Jews further anchors the term and its specifically Christian apocalyptic associations (destruction) in the realm of the vernacular: the figmentum of the Red Jews is a tradition that circulated in German among the laity, not in Latin and not among the educated -- who as early as the first decade of the sixteenth century saw this tale as a figment of the popular imagination.

...

That Jews and red hair were intimately connected in the sixteenth century, not merely in the Middle Ages, is proven by a pamphlet produced by the circle around Reuchlin (which also produced the Epistolae obscurorum virorum (Letters of Obscure Men). This unpleasant excrescence of the 'dirty war' between the German humanists and the Cologne Dominicans attacks both Dominican theology and their personnel. This pamphlet, printed in 1514/15, is a vicious slander aimed at Pfefferkorn. The confession supposedly extracted from him under torture runs as follows:

"Furthermore, he also confessed that he stole two children. He sold one to the Jews, and participated in its torture, and stabbed it in order to collect its blood, to use for their own needs. The other child had red hair; he sent it away unharmed." ¹

¹. 'Die geschicht unnd bekantnuß des getauften Juden / genannt Johannes Pfefferkorn', Württemberqische Landesbibliothek, HBK 142; cited from Heiko A. Oberman, "Johannes Reuchlin: Von Judenknechten zu Judenrechten", in: Proceedings of the Conference 'Reuchlin und die Juden', Pforzheim, 23-26

². "Item er hat auch bekant: er habe zwey kinder gestolen / dz ein den Juden verkaufft und selber helffen martern / unnd gestochen das sy das blut vom im überrupten haben / zu gebrauchen zu irer notturfft. Das ander kindt hat rot har gehacht / das selbig hat er wider hiernweg geschickt on schaden." 'Die geschicht unnd bekantnuß', fil. a2'; cited from
The ugly defamation of ritual murder serves as a frame for an attempt to discredit the combative Pfefferkorn by using thoroughly traditional terms; similarly, a traditional Christian belief in the association between red hair and Jewishness inspired the 'realistic' interjection that Pfefferkorn allowed the red-haired child to go free, presumably because it was Jewish.

Another convert, Antonius Margaritha, draws on Victor to present a slightly different version of this same tale in his

---

Oberman, "Johannes Reuchlin", note 82.

30. Pfefferkorn himself denied that Jews engaged in ritual murder, or that they needed Christian blood for any purpose: "Vort verkundigen ich allen ind ycklichen mynschen na dem dat under uns cristen eyn gemeyn redec sprechende ist, dat die joeden genoedigt syn, Cristen bloitz gebruchende die jonge cristen kyndere deshalben umb zo brengen, und dair beneven mit anderen unnatyrlischen krenckden beladen sullen syn. Weyn aller lieffsten Cristen, wilt geynen geloven her up haven noch setzen, want idt widder die hillige schrijfft und dat gesetz der naturen und widder die redelicheit verfangen wird, unnd dair umb ich ehe die joeden yrre unschoult disser sachen entschuldigen moib..." Judenspiegel (Cologne 1507; Universitäts- und Stadtbibliothek Cologne, ADm 150), fol. giii'. For a thorough discussion, see Kirn, Das Bild vom Juden, 51-54. Pfefferkorn also would suggest at a later date that he knew nothing of such goings-on, perhaps because his former co-religionists had kept him in the dark, since he had never been a very good Jew (see his Beschyrmung, published in 1516, fol. aiiii'; cited by Kirn, 53). The anti-Dominican author(s) of the 1514/15 pamphlet may have chosen to accuse Pfefferkorn of participating in ritual murder not only to tar him as a wicked Jew, but to dismiss his claim that the Jews do not kill Christians for their blood -- especially since Pfefferkorn's ally Johannes Eck claimed to have seen with his own eyes the tortured body of a child allegedly murdered by Jews in Freiburg in 1503 (Kirn, 53).
Der gantz Jüdisch glaub (Augsburg, 1530)." When the narrator asks certain Jews in whom they placed their faith and hope if not in Jesus Christ, they make numerous answers -- the sixth of which Antonius reports as follows: "... they comfort themselves greatly with hopes about the Ten Tribes, whom King Assyrios drove away, and resettled beyond Assyria in the cities Chalo, Chovor by the river Goson and in the city of Modai as you will find in the fourth book of Kings, chapter 17 [II Kings 17:6]. I am greatly puzzled, however, why these Ten Tribes are called Red Jews. They [the Jews] have a firm hope that these Red Jews will come and liberate them -- when God decides to stop the flow of the Sambation. This last, distinctly Jewish element appears in Victor of Carben's treatise as well, but Antonius' version betrays less familiarity with the vernacular and Latin traditions of Europe. Indeed, whereas Victor's Cologne translator felt compelled to add robustissimi to make clear just what the Red Jews are, Antonius is bewildered as to why the Ten Tribes are

---

1. Published by H. Steyner; Wolfenbüttel 171.10 Quod.(10).

2. Salmanasar, king of the Assyrians.

3. II. Kings 17,6: "In the ninth year of Hosea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes."

4. See Appendix A, no. 16, lines 1-9.
called Red Jews. This shows that the term was not only limited to the German-speaking world, but exclusively Christian, since he would have known its meaning had it been current among Jews. Victor and Antonius used the term most likely to be understood by their German-speaking audience.

Antonius claims that the Jews have "Hebrew and German booklets in which they lie a great deal and write about these Ten Tribes and the river Sambation, [...] on the other side of which these Red Jews live". Antonius echoes Victor's refutation of Jewish claims, stating that he has questioned many experienced merchants, and none has heard of such a place; indeed, he wonders, how could it have existed for twenty-two centuries without anyone having discovered so numerous a people and so miraculous a river? These accounts of Jewish hopes concerning the Ten Tribes are not merely a Christian slander on Jewish credulity (as they were intended), but also a rare window on Jewish belief beyond the circle of Talmud, Torah and learned commentaries: the parallel of messianic hopes centered around the Ten Tribes in fifteenth-century Italy makes Victor's and Antonius' rendering very plausible indeed.

\[3\]. Fol. Zi, lines 9-11.

\[4\]. When the Dominican Peter Schwartz reported in his Stern Meschiach of 1477 on a legendary Jewish kingdom in the east, he based his recounting on Jewish tales, and did not allow Christian legends to 'contaminate' what is almost an ethnological field report. Therefore, his version of the Ten Tribes story lacks the term Red Jews. A recent Israeli contribution to the literature concerning the Jewish legend of the Ten Tribes traces the relevant stories from Biblical antiquity to the twentieth century, but mentions neither the Red Jews nor their significance in German literary and exegetical writings: Shalva Weil, Beyond the Sambatyon.

\[5\]. For the German text and my translation, see Appendix A, no. 16, lines 1-26.

In the early sixteenth century, German-Jewish legend concerning the Ten Tribes included ancient elements, such as the uncrossable river Sambation, which will be stopped by God so that the Ten Tribes can come out to liberate the Jews of the Diaspora, as well as reactions to proselytizing Christian arguments, such as the notion of an unbroken tradition of Jewish kingship retained in the east. Victor and Antonius, German-Jewish converts to Christianity, fit these Jewish stories into the Christian tradition according to which Alexander the Great enclosed the Ten Tribes in or beyond the 'Caspian Mountains', and into the more specific German tradition, which calls these Jews 'Red Jews' and sees in them an appallingly strong and warlike people more of destroyers than of avengers -- although these roles are merely two confessional sides of the same apocalyptic coin.

German Christians of the early 16th century had access to the story of the Red Jews not only through medieval literary and exegetical texts and the fifteenth-century Antichrist books (last printing at Erfurt, 1516), but also through Victor's German-language Judenbüchlein and the Latin
The legend of the Red Jews would persist until the end of the sixteenth century, though not without significant 'contamination' from the Jewish legend of the Ten Tribes as saviors of the Jews, via Victor and Antonius.

3. The Reformation: Learning, Latinity and Levels of Discourse.

A) 1523/1524: Varieties of Apocalyptic Expectation

In 1523, Luther published his celebrated pamphlet 'Our Lord Jesus Christ was a born Jew'. In his discussion of the Hebrew term 'alma' (young woman or virgin), Luther drew on centuries of christological re-interpretation of the Hebrew Bible. He presented arguments and a rationale of translation that supported the traditional christological-prophetic interpretation of Isaiah 7,14 while addressing the Hebrew word and its meaning in other contexts. Whatever its philological

---

3. I am indebted to Alan E. Bernstein for the analytic model of 'levels of discourse' as a means of studying the ideas and beliefs of diverse groups without recourse to stiff models that assign texts to official, academic, learned, Latinate, vernacular or popular genres without much regard for the interactions between these groups. See his sensitive use of this analytic tool in "The Invocation of Hell in thirteenth-century Paris", in: Supplementum Festivum. Studies in Honor of Paul Oskar Kristeller, ed. J. Hankins, J. Monfasani, F. Purnell, Jr. (Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies: Binghamton, NY. 1987), 13-54.

merits, this explanation found immediate application or vulgarization in a pamphlet\(^9\) by a supporter of Luther, Michael Kramer (Kromer), minister at Kunitz near Jena. Kramer was to have a checkered career as a pastor; he married and was abandoned by two women of doubtful reputation, then married a third. His theological arguments are muddled, but they demonstrate incontrovertibly how Luther’s finely-nuanced and carefully-argued reforming theology was received, reduced to simpler terms and passed on at a more popular level -- in a condensed and more folksy form suited to a different social and intellectual world than that addressed by Luther. Kramer reproduces Luther’s arguments concerning the word alma and the prophetic content of Isaiah 7.14, but in a halting and abbreviated form, and as a dialogue.\(^1\) This doubtless made Luther’s argument accessible to more people than only those who had the money to buy and the time to read or listen to Luther’s much longer work.

Kramer’s text reflects the theological and historical

---

\(^1\) Kramer, Underredung, 434ff.
contents of contemporary thinking at the level not of the theologians and reformers, but of the common people. Of interest here is 'Rabbi Jacob's' account of a hidden group of Israelites, half of the tribe of Manasseh that stayed behind when Moses led the Jews out of Egypt. These Jews have been enclosed by the river Sambation, which flows so wildly as to prevent crossing, except on the Sabbath, when it rests and Jews are prohibited from travelling. They are called the Red Jews, and they still have prophets -- a dim echo of an argument reported on elsewhere, according to which the Red Jews or Ten Tribes still have 'the scepter' (kingship) somewhere in the east of Asia. According to 'Rabbi Jacob', the Sambation ceased flowing that very summer of 1523 for an entire week, which 'the prophets' interpreted as a sign that God had decided to free the enclosed Jews and lead them home to Israel.

Kramer's pamphlet anticipates many of the details that appear in the five 1523 editions of the 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlet, e.g., the idea that the Turkish 'emperor' (Sultan) and the Red Jews are now fighting or are about to go to war over the Promised Land, and that the Red Jews are an army of six hundred thousand. In both Kramer's and the 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlets, the report concerning the Red Jews is imputed to Jewish sources. There can be no doubt that some version of this tale circulated among Jews, but the action described fits easily into an authoritative German, Christian context of apocalyptic expectation: when the (Red) Jews reconquer Jerusalem, the time of the Antichrist is at hand.

---

7. See Appendix A, no. 18.

Kramer seems here to have drawn on a more central source belonging to a rather higher level of discourse, Victor’s Judenbüchlein. Kramer once again distorts and severely curtails the material of his source, but he also adds details not present in Victor’s account, especially when he refers to the imminent publication of a report concerning the Red Jews. Kramer’s account, then, is an unique testimonial to the serious consideration accorded the legend of the Red Jews in evangelical circles somewhat ‘below’ the level of official Wittenberg doctrinal debate. In 1523, the legend of the Red Jews was presented to a broad readership as true; onto this version of the medieval tale the Jewish story of the Ten Tribes was engrafted.

The year 1523 was charged with hope and fear. Since Johann Lichtenberger’s Prognosticatio in Latino (a fusion of astrological predictions and Joachimite ideas concerning the approaching end, first published in 1488 \[14\]), a second Deluge had been foreseen for the year 1524. Joseph Grünpeck's 1508 Speculum (Latin and German editions) adapted Lichtenberger's work, \[15\] and the main elements of these predictions were taken up in numerous abbreviations and adaptations -- both astrological and prophetic -- printed between 1515 and 1525. \[16\] Johann Virdung of Haßfurt published three prognostications, in 1520, 1521 and 1523, telling of the coming horrors of 1524. His Practica Teutsch of 1521/22 foretells war and floods that would precede the arrival of an 'Endchrist'.

13. Kramer is referring to the 1523 Red and Black Jews pamphlet, treated below. Clemen even reprinted a version in the notes to Kramer’s pamphlet -- without commentary! See Clemen, Flugschriften I, 442-444, note 1; the pages are misnumbered as 342-344.

The best proof that these predictions were taken seriously by many Germans is that supporters of Luther published various 'anti-practica' designed to counteract the influence of such 'superstition'. From the evangelical

---

\[14\] See McGinn, Visions, 270-274; for further literature, see 271, note 8. Lichtenberger was convinced by the advances of the Turks into Christendom (especially Constantinople) that the End was near. Luther published an edition of the Prognosticatio, to which he contributed a preface, in 1527: WA 23.7-12: "Vorrede Martini Luthers auff die weissagung des Johannis Lichtenbergers".

\[16\] Robinson-Hammerstein, "Booklets", 133.

\[17\] These are generally known as "Practica deutsch gezogen aus der Lehre und Prophezeien Sybille, Brigitte, Cyrilli, des Abtes Joachim, Methodii und Bruder Reinhards", or some variation on these themes. They are usually anonymous; see Robinson-Hammerstein, "Booklets", 133.
perspective, superstition meant illegitimate ‘traffic’ in non-Biblical spiritual or religious information. Luther would treat the Red Jews with this same scholarly, critical attitude. Nonetheless, the great popularity and continuity of these practica suggest that they fell on fertile ground among those parts of the population less likely to be reached by learned, especially Latin, treatments of the End Time.

The Peasant’s War erupted in earnest in 1524, but the unrest it reflected had deep roots. The reintroduction of Roman Law and the feudal lords’ attempts to extract more profit from peasant holdings by means of higher taxes and labor services had already led to numerous uprisings. The most important were the revolt of the Piper of Niklashausen in

---

8. Heike Talkenberger, "Prophetie und Zeitgeschehen. Texte und Holzschnitte astrologischer Flugschriften zur ‘Sintflutdebatte’ 1520-1524", in: Reformation und Revolution. Beiträge zum politischen Wandel und den sozialen Kräften am Beginn der Neuzeit. Festschrift Rainer Wohlfeil, eds. Rainer Postel and Franklin Kopitzsch (Stuttgart, 1989), 193-223; here 202. This ‘evangelical perspective’ was by no means novel. Medieval inquisitors (e.g. Etienne de Bourbon) and preachers (Nikolaus von Dinkelsbühl) had been concerned to find and eradicate popular beliefs that they understood as superstition or Aberglauben. For an overview of medieval attacks on lay ‘superstition’, see Karin Baumann, Aberglaube fur Laien. Zur Programmatik und Überlieferung mittelalterlicher Superstitionskritik, 2. vols. (Würzburg, 1989; =Quellen und Forschungen zur europäischen Ethnologie, 5; published typescript of dissertation, Universität Würzburg, 1987).

Franconia (1476), the Bundschuh uprising in Alemannia (1493) with recurrences under Jos Fritz into the sixteenth century, and the 'Poor Conrad' uprising of Swabia (1514). Furthermore, the rising of the Imperial Knights in 1522-1523, involving such luminaries as Ulrich von Hutten and Franz von Sickingen, must have made it seem to contemporaries, steeped as they were in apocalyptic lore, that the world was coming ungled.

It was in 1523 that David Reubeni, the Oriental (or perhaps German\(^a\)) Jew who claimed to be a prince from the tribe of Reuben and an emissary of the Ten Tribes, showed up in Italy. In February of 1524, he was received with all due ceremony by several cardinals and by Pope Clement VII.\(^b\) The context of fifteenth century Jewish and Christian expectations concerning the Ten Tribes helps explain the extraordinary success met with by the 'mission' of the mysterious David. He announced that his people, one of the ten lost tribes of Israel, had survived and constituted a powerful kingdom in Arabia. David also capitalized on the fear inspired by Ottoman military successes -- the same vague and widespread uneasiness that produced the 1523 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlet. He proposed to the Pope that if 'Christendom' were to furnish ships and weapons, as well as a military contingent, his people would help to drive the Turk from the Holy Land.

\(^a\) Adolf Neubauer suggests that David Reuben was a German Jew: "Where are the Ten Tribes?", IV, 408.

The earliest source to describe this episode is the Iggeret Orhot Olam of Abraham Perussol (Farissol/Faritzol)\(^2\), published at Ferrara in 1524; subsequent generations of Jewish scholars — few Christians have shown interest in the topic — have gathered and ordered the evidence.\(^3\)

\(^3\) This tale is also reported by Rabbi David Gans (1541-1613) in his Zemah David ('The Seed of David'), published at Prague in 1592. The material is available to non-Hebraists in a 1644 Latin translation of the Zemah David (Chronologia Sacra-Profana; A mundi conditu ad annum M. 5352 vel Christi 1592, dicta // Zemah David // Germain Davidis // Auctore R. David Gans // per Guilielmmum Henric. Vorstium, Lugduni Batavorum, Ioannis Maire, 1644; 152. Wolfenbüttel 125.24 Quod.). Adolf Neubauer devoted eight pages to the story: "Where are the Ten Tribes?", IV, 408-415. On pages 415-423, Neubauer briefly summarizes Jewish reports concerning the Ten Tribes from 1523/24 to his own time. Heinrich Graetz tells the story at considerable length in his History of the Jews, IV, 491ff. Salo Wittmayer Baron also devotes a number of pages to this topic in his Social and Religious History of the Jews, XIII, 109-115; his notes, on pages 364-366 are a treasure-trove of sources and information on this colorful episode of Jewish-Christian relations. On page 110, Baron summarizes the eyewitness account of Daniel da Pisa, "a wealthy banker and leader of the Roman Jewish community", who served as an interpreter when Reubeni was admitted to an audience with the Pope: "David claimed that he had been sent by Jews living 300,000 strong in the desert of Tabor (Habor, Khaibar), in order to conclude an alliance with the Pope and other Christian potentates. The Christian rulers were to supply the Jewish warriors with artillery and ammunition, as well as a few instructors, so that they might successfully open a new front against the Turks. " (111). Clement, whatever his reservations might have been (Baron assumes "the papal Curia undoubtedly had considerable reservations about the veracity
David did not have much trouble persuading Christians and Jews alike of his claims. The messianic mood was intense at this time among European and Eastern Jews, and both Jews and Christians put great stock in the age-old story of the Ten Tribes. The geographer Abraham Ferussol, who knew David Reubeni personally, comments:

"Be this as it may [a Jewish kingdom in the east], true or not, and whatever this Jew may be, in our country [Italy] kings, princes and the people believe that the Tribes are still in existence, that they are numerous, and that they have many kings."

Reubeni was received by Pope Clement VII in 1524. He had presented letters of introduction from Portuguese captains and business agents. These letters were sent to the Portuguese court for verification, which was provided. Reubeni was treated as an ambassador at Rome; he rode through the streets on a white mule accompanied by ten Jews and more than two of David’s assertions; 111), sent David off with two letters, one to the king of Portugal and another to the king of Abyssinia. The first, dated September 17th, 1524, recommends David and his mission to the Portuguese king, and states that giving David the few cannon and cannoneers he requested might be advantageous to ‘the Christian commonwealth’. I am indebted to Gordon Weiner (Arizona State University, Tempe) for his generous help.

5. For Ferussol’s report, see Adolf Neubauer, "Where are the Ten Tribes?, IV. 409; this passage is translated by Neubauer from Ferussol’s influential work Iggeret Orhot Olam (Ferrara, 1524), the fourteenth chapter of which is devoted to the fate of the ten lost tribes.
hundred Christians. Reuben eventually left Rome for Portugal, equipped with letters of introduction from Clement VII, who seems to have supported David's project to reconquer the Holy Land with Christian and Jewish forces. Clement asked the Portuguese king to have Portuguese captains sailing to the Red Sea and Indian Ocean investigate Reuben's story.

As we have seen, in the fifteenth century, the Jewish communities of Italy received a series of letters from the middle East reporting that the Ten Tribes had crossed the Sambation. Amidst the tribulations of the 1520s, many were ready to believe that the messianic age was at hand. Some calculations placed the coming of the Redeemer in 1524, which lent added credibility to David's message. The hard-pressed Jews of the Iberian Peninsula saw in David Reuben a precursor of the Messiah or of the Messianic age and of the imminent return to Jerusalem. Reuben, however, claimed to be on a military mission. Graetz explains Jewish credulity by pointing out that after 1492, the Marranos in the Iberian peninsula "lived and breathed messianic hopes and dreams as the only answer to their well-nigh impossible situation". In response to the news of the arrival at Lisbon of an emissary from the 'Jewish Kingdom', a new wave of Marranos flooded from Spain into Portugal to be closer to their supposed savior. David stepped carefully and tried to make no promises, but all eyes were fixed on him.

---

This dark-skinned emissary, or rather adventurer, inspired at least one New Christian, a Portuguese Marrano called Diogo Pires, to convert publicly to Judaism and proclaim the imminent coming of the Messiah. Pires, who took the Hebrew name Salomo Molcho, was driven by messianic dreams and visions. When he approached Reubeni to discover whether or not his visions coincided with Reubeni’s mission, Reubeni gave him the cold shoulder, explaining that his was a military, not a messianic mission.

To prove his sincerity, Molcho broke laws aimed at eradicating Jewish observances by circumcising himself. Some months later, when he had recovered -- presumably from infection --, he was spirited out of Portugal. He travelled to the Jewish communities of the Ottoman Empire, including Adrianople, Salonica and Safed, where he made a deep impression and gathered a considerable following. He introduced Joseph Karo to the *Cabalah" and inspired this sober Sephardic exile with a messianic fervor similar to his own. On his return to Italy in the late 1520s, Molcho secured the protection of the Pope, which extended so far as to save him from the bonfires of the Inquisition: a surrogate was sent to die for him on the pyre. While David was in favor at the Portuguese court, King João seemed to have forgotten his previous intention to eradicate the Marranos left in his kingdom. The expulsion of Spanish Jewry in 1492 and the forced baptisms of 1497 (under João’s predecessor Manoel) had created a large community of conversos in Portugal, some of whom were sincere Christians and some of whom were not. The Lisbon massacre of 1506 had not solved any problems, only poisoned the religious atmosphere more thoroughly. The circumcision and flight of Salomo Molcho, who under his Christian name had been a royal secretary, gave great offense at court. It was suggested to the king that David had abetted Pires/Molcho. As a result, João expelled David from Portugal, and ended his toleration of the Marranos at the instigation of his queen, the Dominican order and

---

---

Miguel da Silva, the Portuguese emissary to Rome.

When the ship carrying David and his retinue away from Portugal was wrecked off the coast of Spain, in 1525, David was captured and imprisoned by the Spanish authorities. He was ordered to appear before the Inquisition but released when Charles V intervened. David fled to Avignon under papal protection.

The feverish apocalyptic and messianic expectations both of Jews and of Christians assured Reubeni some kind of hearing and support wherever he went. Reubeni and Molcho were received by Emperor Charles V at Regensburg in 1532. Molcho’s career as an enthusiastic proponent of the Cabbalah and of messianic hopes would end at the stake at Mantua in the same year; Charles had him burned as an apostate. David Reubeni was imprisoned by Charles at the same time, and eventually fell into the hands of the Spanish Inquisition, which condemned him in 1538 to ‘relaxation’ -- to the secular authorities, for execution.

The rumors, tales and pamphlets concerning a Jewish kingdom in the east were very real to both Christians and Jews alike, real enough to secure the belief and support of Clement

---

4. Idem.

VII; to guarantee Reuben’s safety in Portugal, where no Jews were allowed to live as Jews; to secure his release from Spanish captivity by order of the Emperor; and to induce Charles V to grant him and Salomo Molcho an audience. Both Molcho and Reuben had participated in efforts by the Portuguese New Christians to block the introduction of the Inquisition in Portugal; both had attracted a dedicated following and inspired considerable trust for nearly ten years. The desperate condition of the ‘conversos’ or Marranos after 1492 fanned the flames of apocalyptic and messianic expectations in the Jewish communities of Europe; these expectations were mirrored in Christian apocalyptic hopes and fears as well, right down to the details of the supposed Ten Lost Tribes or Red Jews. Neither Graetz nor Baron seems to have noticed that not only Jews, but also Christians, including some very influential figures, were easily persuaded by Reuben and Molcho.

3) The Red and Black Jews of 1523

Into this climate of feverish expectation concerning the Last Things (‘imminentism’) and unrest both actual and anticipated, burst a pamphlet of frightful aspect.⁶ We have

⁶ On the importance of pamphlets and their meteoric rise in the German-speaking lands from about 1517 to 1525, see the impressive collection of articles, esp. that of Richard G. Cole, "The Reformation Pamphlet and Communication Processes", in: Flugschriften als Massenmedium der Reformationszeit. Beiträge zum Tübinger Symposion 1980. ed. Hans-Joachim Köhler seen that its appearance was announced in advance by Michael Kramer, a marginal member of Luther's circle at Wittenberg. It ran through at least five editions in that same year. The impact of such a pamphlet is difficult to gauge; the number of copies printed per edition, impossible to establish with any (Stuttgart, 1981; =Spätmittelalter und frühe Neuzeit 13), 139-161.

7. The text reproduced and translated in Appendix A, no. 18 is from the following edition, probably the second: Von einer grosse meng/ und gewalt der Juden, with a woodcut, 4 sheets, [Augsburg: Steiner], 1523; Wolfenbüttel 196.14 Hi (9), reproduced in Hans-Joachim Köhler's microfiche collection (Flugschriften des frühen 16. Jahrhunderts, Zug 1978ff), Fiche 1304, no. 3374, made from München SB 4° Ded. 102/4 (Res).

According to textual evidence, what is probably the first edition, dated 1523, is reprinted in Clemen, Flugschriften, vol. 1, 342-344. This version corresponds to number 2082 of Panzer's Annalen II, 231; it was printed by Clemen from the copy held by the Zwickau Ratsschulbibliothek (XVII. IX.16). Steiner produced another edition, with slightly different orthography but with the same woodcut title page, in 1523: HAB 131.1 Th. (27), Köhler Fiche 1044, Nr. 2636; noted in Emil Weller's Repertorium typographicum. Die deutsche Literatur im ersten Viertel des sechzehnten Jahrhunderts, im Anschluß an Hains Repertorium und Panzers deutsche Annalen (Nördlingen 1864/Hildesheim 1961 (Olms reprint), vol. III of Panzer's Annalen reprint), no. 2616 (p. 294). According to Weller, a fourth version is present in Dresden and Vienna (as well as Munich); number 2615: Ein send / briefv von einer gros= se meng der Juden, 1523; this version differs slightly from the first two in that the title ends with the words "zum teyl glaublich und warhafftig underricht". It is also written in a southern German dialect.

A fifth version is reproduced by Köhler, Fiche 1659, Nr. 4279, taken from München SB Rar.4290. This copy is also dated 1523 and has the same contents, though orthography and typesetting differ; a final comment has been added: "Got schicks zu'm pessten": May God grant that it all turn out well.

See also the Flugschriftensammlung Gustav Freytag, ed. Paul Hohenheimer (Frankfurt a/M, 1925), 46-47.
precision. The best-informed estimates provided by historians of books and printing suggest that editions of up to 4,000 copies appeared in the 1520s, but that was the first edition of Luther's 'An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation' of 1520. Data concerning government-sponsored broadsides printed at Ulm suggest much more modest figures -- three editions of 100 copies and one of 200; a series of Bamberg broadsides published between 1527 and 1537 came out in printings numbering as few as 110 and as many as 1,500 copies. The pamphlet, which would seem to have appealed to a fairly broad audience, was a popular production more attuned to the law of the market than a government broadside, but of less lasting interest and commercial potential than Luther's appeal to the German nobility. The 1523 pamphlet may have come out in a modest first edition, but the subsequent four editions prove that there was considerable demand: it is not unreasonable to suggest that, given a total of five editions by different printers, between 1,000 and 5,000 copies of this pamphlet circulated in southern Germany.

---

2. No northern German version has come to light. Lucien Febvre and Henri-Jean Martin have stated, concerning book printing, that from the late fifteenth to the middle of the sixteenth century, "an average edition [consisted] of These pamphlets reported the imminent arrival of a great horde of Jews marching out of the deserts of Africa. The size of editions is still a vexed question. In his short overview of the pamphlet genre, "Pamphlet Literature of the German Reformation", Steven Ozment does not mention the question of printing runs, though he is concerned to demonstrate the broad appeal and dissemination (via reading aloud) of Reformation-era pamphlets; in: Reformation Europe: A Guide to Research, ed. S. Ozment (St. Louis, MO: Center for Reformation Research, 1982), 85-106. Likewise, in his important article "Stadt und Buch. Bemerkungen zur Struktur der reformatorischen Bewegung in Deutschland", Bernd Moeller makes the case that the printed book was extraordinarily important in the dissemination and functioning of the Reformation in the German cities; yet he nowhere addresses the question of how many copies of the books (which include 'pamphlets') in question were actually printed. Stadtbürgertum und Adel in der Reformation. Studien zur Sozialgeschichte der Reformation in England und Deutschland/The Urban Classes, the Nobility and the Reformation. Studies on the Social History of the Reformation in England and Germany, ed. W. Mommsen, P. Alter and R. Scribner (Stuttgart, 1979; =Publications of the German Historical Institute London 5), 25-39. None of the articles in Flugschriften als Massenmedium der Reformationszeit faces this question squarely.

This detail corresponds to the tradition of Eldad the Danite, rather than to the traditional legend of the Red Jews, who had always been located in the far north-east of Asia; this pamphlet displays features of many different traditions and may even have been influenced by Victor von Carben's Judenbüchlein of 1508. For the title-page woodcut, which depicts an army of Jews, recognizable by their pointed Jews' hats, coming out of the mountains, and about to cross a river, see Appendix D, no. 6. In the foreground, a snake represents the poisonous beasts of the desert. The river is the army of 600,000 consisted of schwartz und rodt Juden (black and red Jews), who were encamped a mere thirty days' march from Jerusalem. They had, according to this account, demanded Jerusalem from the Sultan, and threatened to take it by force if necessary. This announcement can, indeed must, be read in two ways that are not at all mutually exclusive:

1) it was meant to sound the loudest alarm possible: it was the latest news from the front in the great battle between God and the Antichrist. Its message, clear to those who read it or heard it read, is that the world is about to end; the Last Judgment is about to take place. This interpretation, not immediately evident from the text of the pamphlet, is supported by the apocalyptic context in which the Red Jews are discussed by Victor von Carben, Antonius Margaritha, Johannes Agricola and Martin Luther. Luther and Agricola reject explicitly the popular Christian legend of the Red Jews as apocalyptic destroyers -- with sufficient vehemence to establish that this popular legend was current and widespread in third decade of the sixteenth century.

2) At the same time, as shown by the subsequent pamphlet tradition of the Red Jews, the immediate occasion for this report was the Turkish threat. The wars of the preceding decade in Egypt and Palestine between the Ottoman lords and Sambation, and it is still.
local groups, such as the Mamlûks, are the background to this pamphlet; even the Persian Sophoy (shah or ruler)\(^4\) is said to be involved. In this part of the world, then as now, geopolitics is inextricably linked with theology -- particularly with the eschatological interpretation of the 'signs of the times'. The 1523 pamphlet addresses both 'high politics' and theology, interpreting them through pre-existing categories drawn from the world of popular apocalyptic ideas and beliefs. It fitted perceptions of new political events into a traditional religious, exegetical framework, much as Luther did when he interpreted the Pope as the Antichrist, or the Turks as Gog and Magog.

The role the Jews were to play as the Last Things unfolded was far from clear. The apocalyptic background of this remarkable pamphlet offered a wide range of predictions about the conversion of the Jews, about the Jewish servants of the Antichrist, and even about the Messiah awaited by the Jews. To many Christian authors, the Jewish Messiah was none other than the Antichrist. The central concern of such exeges was generally not the Jews or their apocalyptic role, but rather the horrifying Eschaton itself -- the final judgement predicted in such graphic and horrible detail in Revelation, the Sibylline prophecies, and the 'revelations' and apocalyptic tales popular in the Middle Ages. Many apocalyptic texts make little or no mention of Jews; others, as in the case of this pamphlet, concentrate on the role of the Jews at the end of time without making overt reference to concomitant apocalyptic themes.

\(^4\) Sophoy or sophy is from the sixteenth-century Persian cafî, surname of the ruling dynasty of Persia from c.1500 - c.1736, derived from the Arabic epithet cafî-ud-dîn ('purity of religion') given to an ancestor of Ismail Sophy, founder of the dynasty. See the Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology, ed. C.T. Onions (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1966), 346. This may have been an echo of an approach to the Persian Shah as a possible ally against the Turks, made in the early 1520s by Charles V. See Stephen Fischer-Galati, Ottoman Imperialism and German Protestantism 1521-1555 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1959), 16.

These pamphlets contain a tantalizing reference to black Jews living in Africa, whom we know as the Beta Israel or Falasha. Although stories about black Jews living in Africa had circulated for many centuries, these Jews are not

---

83. Around the end of the ninth century, a long tradition of speculation in Jewish and Arab sources concerning the whereabouts of the scattered tribes of Israel crystallized into the narrative of Eldad the Danite, who appeared in Qairouan (Kairowán, in modern-day Tunisia), where he told the Jewish community that he had been in communication with the important in western, or rather, Christian, ideas about what the Jews' function was to be in the history of salvation. However, the Ten Tribes did play such a role, especially in the German-speaking lands, under the name Red Jews: a term that caught, stored, amalgamated and amplified prejudices about Jews and fears about the destruction to come at the end of time. In the 1523 pamphlets, the Red Jews are held to be

Ten Tribes, mentioning Jews in Africa as well as the Judeo-Chazaric kingdom (near the Black Sea). Adolf Neubauer notes in the commentary to his translation that this story spread quickly and became "the Arabian Nights of the Jews": "Where are the Ten Tribes?", here 98-99; translation 99-104. See chapter 2. Leslau notes: "The sources for our knowledge of the Falashas are of various kinds. Among the oldest testimonies to the existence of Jews in Ethiopia are the reports of Jewish travelers like Eldad Haddani [ha-Dani] (ninth century), Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century), Elijah of Ferrara (fifteenth century) and others. Most of these accounts report things of legendary character that lack historical basis, and are presumably based on hearsay. Ethiopia was known throughout the Middle Ages as the country of Prester John and was supposed to be the habitat of the Ten Tribes. This idea excited the curiosity of travelers who vaguely related that there were Jews living in Ethiopia or that Jews had come thither from other countries." (Falasha Anthology, ix). Leslau ignores the role of tradition in such reports, and fails to mention the older and, in the middle ages, more usual customs according to which Prester John was ruler of the Indies and the Ten Tribes had been exiled to Asia.

The Jerusalem Kabbalist Abraham ben Eliezer ha-Levi wrote in a letter dated 1528 that the Jews of Ethiopia were the tribes of Gad and Dan; in a letter addressed to Avraham of Perugia in 1523, Israel Ashkenazi of Jerusalem mentions a man from one of the Lost Tribes, said to be fluent in Cushite and Hebrew, who claimed that there was in his country no written book of the Oral Law, as is the case among the Falasha. Later rabbinical authorities, including the former chief Sephardi rabbi of Israel, Ovadiah Yosef, would argue that the Ethiopian Jews were descended from the tribe of Dan (Weil, Beyond the Sambatyon, 89).
descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel. However, the connection to Alexander, Gog and Magog, so clear in the fifteenth-century Antichrist books and in later sixteenth-century pamphlets (where Alexander appears -- without reference to Gog and Magog -- as the encloser of the Ten Tribes), is missing. For the modern reader, the apocalyptic element is only implicit in the 1523 text: contemporaries, steeped as they were in apocalyptic lore, knew that if the Jews are making for Jerusalem, the end of the world must be at hand.

The 1523 Red and Black Jews pamphlet must be seen not only against the background of apocalyptic tradition and expectation, but in its immediate historical context. The rapidly-expanding Ottoman empire, under the generalship of Selîm I (1512-1520), conquered Syria and the Mamlûk armies of Al-Ghawri at Marj Dâbik on 24 August 1516; the Mamlûk sultan died on the battlefield. Egypt held out until 22 January 1517 under Tuman Bey; on 17 July, 1517, the Sharif of Mecca sent Selîm the keys of the Holy Cities and announced his submission. All of Syria, Palestine, Egypt and the Hejaz were under Ottoman suzerainty. The Ottoman state had developed from a frontier state to become the ruler and protector of the Islamic world; state income from tolls, tariffs and taxes filled the Palace treasury to overflowing -- thus establishing the preconditions for the aggressive imperialism of Süleyman I ('The Magnificent'; r.1520-1566).

---

However, Ottoman rule in the newly-conquered middle East was still precarious. Revolts in Damascus in 1520-21 preceded a series of revolts in Egypt from 1522-1524. Following the death of the pro-Ottoman governor Kha'ir Bey in 1522, Mamlûk notables in Egypt fomented a series of revolts against Ottoman rule. The first was precipitated by the arrival of Mustafa Pasha, brother-in-law of Süleyman, as successor to Kha'ir Bey. A more serious rebellion occurred in late summer and autumn of 1523. Ahmed Pasha, a man of Caucasian origin, linked to the Mamlûks, appointed viceroy of Egypt in August of 1523, was disappointed by this post and declared himself Sultan. He committed deliberate acts of lèse-majesté by having his name recited in public prayer and stamped on the coinage. He assembled a large army, composed largely of Mamlûks, and held onto power until toppled by Ottoman forces in 1524.

These goings-on are echoed roughly and sensationaly in

---

\footnote{O. E. Pitcher, \textit{An Historical Geography of the Ottoman Empire} (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1972), 111-112; see also \textit{The New Cambridge Modern History}, ed. G.R. Elton, II (Cambridge 1962), 511.}

the 1523 pamphlet. It had been reported to the Jew who ' narrates' the text that "... all the Jewish land, Jerusalem, Egypt and Arabia along with many other countries that belong to the Holy Sepulchre had seceded from the Turk and submitted to the Sophoy, and that they fully intended to defend themselves and the Holy Sepulchre against Turkish aggression. In response, the Turk has dispatched a great many ships to Cairo against the Sophoy, who has in turn increased his forces at sea and on land against the Turk. Thus, it seems that this is the sole reason for the Turkish advance on Hungary and other countries this summer."57

The notion that the 'Jewish lands' as well as 'Arabia' and Egypt had gone over to the Sophy was not fanciful: the Ottoman authorities feared an alliance between the rebellious ruler of Egypt, Ahmed Pasha, and Isma'il Sophy.5 Therefore, the portentous events of the early 1520s concerned lordship not only over Mecca and Medina, the two most holy cities of Islam.

57. See Appendix A. no. 18, fol. aiii'- aiii', lines 22-28 and 1-6.

5. The suggested connection between the Egyptian rebels and the Persian sophy did not exist, according to all available evidence. However, Holt admits the possibility of a connection between Ahmed's rebellion (1523) and the pre-existing imperial and religious hostility between Isma'il Sophy, the Shi'ite ruler of Persia, and the Sunni' Süleyman.
One of Ahmed's principal advisors was originally a Shi'ite from the Safawiyya heartland. Holt, Egypt and the Fertile Crescent, 50. In the period 1514-1516, Isma'il had engaged in active hostilities with Selîm over Tabriz, Syria and other places.
Selîm believed there was a secret alliance between Qansuh, Mamlûk ruler of Egypt, and Isma'il. Pitcher, An Historical Geography of the Ottoman Empire, 101-104. The New Cambridge Modern History claims that Qansuh "intended to support" Isma'il against Selîm, but only to further his own interests and weaken the Ottomans -- not because of any pre-existing alliance (vol. I, 414).
but also over the Jewish and Christian spiritual 'capital', Jerusalem. As we have seen, lordship over Jerusalem was a central element of Christian apocalypticism, just as it had been a central element of Christian politics, since the early Middle Ages at least. Naval power, evoked in simple terms as 'a great many ships' sent by 'the Turk' to Cairo, had been the key to Ottoman expansion around the shores of the Mediterranean; the victory of Lepanto (1571) was received with such jubilation in Europe precisely because of the record and reputation of the Turkish navy.\(^n\)

The information that Turkish forces had advanced on Hungary 'this summer' places the pamphlet in the center of the inter-Habsburg debate on the Turkish problem. Charles V, fully occupied in Italy and Germany, could not be persuaded to take the Turkish menace seriously; nor could the Imperial Diet of Worms (1521), even though Ferdinand of Spain was involved in a constant struggle to procure military assistance for the hard-pressed Hungarians. In 1522, the Diet agreed to send 3,000 men to Hungary -- a tiny fraction of the 24,300 troops the Hungarians were requesting. In January of 1524, the Estates agreed at the Diet of Nuremberg to send a larger force, largely to show themselves willing to follow the lead of the Emperor, who had now decided to aid the Hungarians — yet this hope was to be dashed at the less pliant Diet convened at Speyer in 1526 (partly because Charles refused to call a council to establish a 'German Church') and by the Turkish victory at Mohacs in the same year.¹

The author of the 1523 pamphlet sees the appearance of the Red Jews and the military goings-on in the Middle East as "the sole reason for the Turkish advance on Hungary and other countries this summer"; this may mean that he felt the Turkish advance was part of a larger apocalyptic movement. The extreme compression of information that characterizes a small pamphlet of this kind precludes definitive analysis of the exact place of this text in the larger context of imperial German and Habsburg politicking over the Turkish threat.

The pamphlet's author followed current events in eastern Europe, the Mediterranean basin and Middle East closely. From the perspective of the historian, the events to which he reacts belong to the history of empires in the early modern period. He, however, fitted what he had heard into the scheme that made most sense to him: the history of the single Empire.

¹. Fischer-Galati, Ottoman Imperialism, 20-23.
the civitas dei, which measures time by the eternal events of salvation-history.

4. Scepticism, Learning and Literalism: The End of the Fable

Scholars who had converted from the Jewish faith to Christianity were not the only people in sixteenth-century Germany to disbelieve the story of the Red Jews. One text intended for a learned audience showed an intimate acquaintance with the term and the motif. The work in question is a Latin treatise on evangelical preaching in Strasbourg, dated 1523. On the last page appears a brief note to the effect that it was printed "In Arabia, among the Red Jews, in the third Olympiad, thirty days from Jerusalem". This mocking subterfuge suggests both a knowledge of the legend, and the consciousness that the place referred to was legendary.

---

7. Num recte / dictum sit a concionato=/ ribus arg[entiinis] nihil nobis / tribus, nihil nobis / auferas, Iosephi / Pacatii iudic= cium, Wolfenbüttel 1215.1Th. (5) The fictitious place of printing is found on the last page: ARABIAE APUD IUDAEO S R/= BROS, OLIMPIADE TER=/ TIA, TRIGINTA DIE=/ BUS A IERUSA=/ LEM.

7. The details (Red Jews in Arabia, thirty days from Jerusalem) suggest a knowledge of the 1523 Black and Red Jews pamphlet. One possible interpretation is that the author meant to suggest that Reformation preaching and the cause of the Reformation would sweep Christendom like the Red Jews to prepare Christians for the End Time -- yet this would fit Luther's world-view better than that of the urbane Latinist who wrote this pamphlet.
In the preface to his Latin translation of Luther’s 1523 treatise on the Jews, ‘Libellus Martini Lutheri, Christum Iesum, verum Iudeum et semen esse Abrahae’ (Wittenberg 1524), Luther’s confederate Justus Jonas (+1555)\(^4\) is as sceptical as Victor von Carben concerning the Jewish tale of continuing kingship in the East, and just as eager to make converts. However, the fresh success of evangelical preaching in the optimistic period preceding the Peasants’ War inspired in Jonas hopes of mass conversions among the Jews as God’s Word and wondrous works spread like wildfire. Noteworthy is Jonas’ bitingly satirical tone: the Rabbis invent such stories \((\text{ fingunt; comminiscuntur})\) to hoodwink the common people with vain Messianic hopes. The idea of a Jewish kingdom in the East is so ridiculous to Jonas that he is moved to sketch a science fiction plot, asking why the Rabbis don’t just say it is on the moon.\(^5\)

\(^1\) Jonas was made Provost (Propst) of the Castle Church and Professor of Theology at Wittenberg in 1521; he led the reform at Halle, 1541-1546, after which he fell from favor with his patron, Duke Maurice of Saxony. For a description of Jonas’ role as Luther’s ‘special advisor’ on Jewish matters, see Oberman, Wurzeln des Antisemitismus, 61 and 210-211.

\(^5\) "My hope is that this treatise will profit more readers in Latin than in German. It seems clear that we have reached the Jews, for they are called away from their Talmudic niggling by the Word of God and the clear meaning of Scripture in no different a manner than we are from Scotistic and Thomistic dreams. Indeed, there is no doubt that they, whose task it is to preserve the truth of the Scriptures of Moses and the Prophets, will be moved no little amount by these arguments. The Rabbis falsely claim (for their sole occupation
In his well-known German Proverbs of 1528/29, Johannes Agricola (1492-1566) addressed a pressing contemporary issue: the scholastics had debated a great deal whether a person might be saved by faith alone. "They say", he reports, "that Alexander the Great fell to his knees and earnestly begged God to bring the Caspian Mountains together and thus enclose the Red Jews; which happened. This was the origin of the fable that the Red Jews would appear with Enoch and Elijah before Doomsday. But no matter if the fable is true or not, Alexander's faith cannot have saved him, because it is certain that no faith brings salvation except faith in Christ Jesus, as Paul teaches." This is not the story of the Red is to milk the common herd by proffering this sort of vain hope) that the scepter and the Jewish state have survived in Babylon, just as if lies in this matter could not be publicly disproved! Why not say that the kingdom of the Jews has been transferred to the cities on the moon? But we must pray for this people, especially since among ourselves not everyone is a Christian who bears the title of Christianity. I hope that this affair concerning the Jews will proceed so well that the rapid spread of the Word, in so short a time, will produce miraculous changes, and we will see yet again the wondrous works of God. Farewell in the Lord." See Appendix B, no. 31, for the Latin text.

8. Dreyhundert / Gemeyner Sprichworter, / der wir Deutschen uns ge=/ brauchen, und doch nicht / wissen woher sie kommen (Hagenau, 1529), Wolfenbüttel P 1143.8° Helmst. (1a); the recent edition of Sander L. Gilman is reliable and handy: Die Sprichwörtersammlung, 2 vols. (Berlin and New York, 1971).

7. "...Es ist bey den Schullerern hoch gehandelt / worden/ob eines yglichen menschen glau=/ be den menschen selig mache? Denn sie sa=/ gen/daß der Grosse Alexander auff seine / knie gefallen sey/und von Gott ernstlich ge=/ betten/Er Jews qua Ten Tribes cobbled together by Victor, but the medieval German legend, complete with Alexander the Great, Enoch, Elijah and the Last Days. Agricola counted on his readers' response to well-known proverbs and popular wisdom to make his points. His audience would know who the Red Jews were, so he could refer to them in a teaching parable. The story was well-enough known for Agricola to call it a 'fable', to explain its origin and to suggest in an undertone that it was not to be believed.

When Luther commented in 1530 on Ezekiel 38 and 39, the standard and original locus for Gog and Magog, he was

---

"Es ist vorhin gnug angezeigt, wie Gog der Tu'rcke sein herkommen hat aus den Tattern odder roten Juden, da der grosse Cam ko'ning ist, wie die landferer sagen, welche urspru'nglich den namen Magog haben, Gene. am zehenden. [...] Also heisst hie der heilige geist den Tu'rcken nach seinem vaterland Maqog, und aus zorn den Gog." in: 'Das XXXVIII. und XXXIX. Capitel Hesechiel vom Gog', WA 30/2.223-236; 224,9-12 and 21-22. "It has already been sufficiently proven that Gog the Turk is descended from the Tatars or Red Jews, where the Great Khan is king (as the vagabonds say), who [sc. the Tatars or Red Jews] originally were called Maqog, as in the book of Genesis, chapter 10. [...] Therefore, the Holy Ghost calls the Turk 'Magog', after his country of origin, but 'Gog' is a short form used in anger."
certain that the prophecy concerning their disastrous arrival would soon be fulfilled. Indeed, he hoped it would, as did many others who saw in their own times nothing but the last days of a corrupt saeculum. He interpreted Gog and Magog to mean in contemporary times the Turks. He alleges that the Turks were descended from a people he calls the 'Tatars or Red Jews', who lived under the great Khan and were originally called Magog. Luther seems to have patched together a picture of this apocalyptic nation from the popular legend of the Red Jews, from medieval authors such as Matthew of Paris, who called the Tatars descendants of the Ten Tribes, and perhaps even from early sixteenth-century maps, which placed Gog and Magog, the 'enclosed Jews' and the Tatar khans in the same general vicinity in the far north-eastern corner of Asia. Luther was particularly concerned to establish the apocalyptic credentials of the Turks. He used the popular reputation of

---

"...". Cited by Anderson, Alexander's Gate, 70-71.

"...". On Luther's view concerning the Turks as members of the cast in the final drama, see G. Vogler, Luther's Geschichtsauffassung im Spiegel seines Türkenbildes. 450 Jahre Reformation (Berlin 1976), esp. 118-127. See also Göllner, Turcica III, "Eschatologische Betrachtungen zur Konfrontation mit den Osmanen", 173-186; H. Buchanan, "Luther and the Turk 1519-1529", in: ARG 47, Heft 1 (1956), 144-160; G.W. Forrell, "Luther and the War against the Turks", in: Church History 14 (1945), 256-271. For a more broadly conceived view, see J.W. Bohnstedt, The Infidel Scourge of God: The Turkish Menace as Seen by German Pamphleteers of the Reformation Era. Transactions of the American Philosophical Society 58/9 (Philadelphia, 1968), and Kenneth M. Setton, Western Hostility to Islam and Prophecies of Doom (Philadelphia: American the Red Jews to do so. He did not believe that there were armies of Red Jews waiting to descend on Christendom, but that the Turks were at the door. He saw in them the descendants of the Red Jews 'who were originally called Magog'. Luther knew the old stories, and fitted pieces of them, like puzzle parts, into his own apocalyptic narrative, justifying his religious analysis of secular events by their relation to the eternal events of salvation history. Here, as elsewhere in Luther's statements concerning the Jews, he addresses his comments not so much to the 'Jewish question' or any such modern set of concerns, but toward the End, meaning not just devastation and damnation, but also conversion and salvation. The presence of actual Jews in everyday life was not needed for this explosive and fundamentally antisemitic cocktail of political and religious analysis to be accepted and to function as rationale for discriminating against Jews. Indeed, the trend of expulsion, sanctioned by Luther in 1543, fit well with the notion that the Jews are somehow allied with or related to the Turks. The relatively mild conditions enjoyed by Jews in the Ottoman empire and the exodus of Sephardic Jews to the cities of the Ottoman empire were important factors that served to establish links between the Jews and the Turks.

Stanford J. Shaw, The Jews of the Ottoman Empire and the Turkish Republic (New York University Press: New York, 1991): "Most [Jewish refugees from Spain] followed the bulk of their Jewish brothers from the rest of Europe eastward through the lands bordering the Mediterranean into the territory of the greatest Muslim power of the time, the empire of the Ottoman sultans..." (15); he estimates that after 1492, about 36,000 Spanish Jews settled in Istanbul alone (37). In 1530, there were about 17,000 Jews in Salonica, which had been depopulated after the Turkish take-over in 1430 (38). Jerusalem had sheltered only 76 Jewish households in 1488, due to the chaos attendant on the collapse of the Mamlûk empire; in 1525-26, there were 199 Jewish households, at which time there were 233 Jewish households in Safed (400). Shaw notes that Jews had traditionally welcomed the Turks as liberators, going so far as to help admit Turkish invaders to Constantinople in 1453; the local Jewish populations rejoiced at the Turkish capture of the island of Rhodes (1522), Buda and Pest (1526) and Belgrade (1526) (26-27). It is fruitless to speculate as to whether or not the exodus of Spanish refugees to the Ottoman empire was seen by Christians as a sign of the approaching end, given the belief that the Antichrist would gather the Jews at Jerusalem: at least my research has turned up no evidence that sixteenth-century Christians saw the expulsions in this light. See also Abraham David, "Safed, foyer de retour au judaïsme des conversos au XVIe siècle", in: Revue d'études juives 146/1-2 (France, 1987), 63-83. For a more specific look at the economic and political activities of Jews in the early modern Ottoman empire, see Mark Alan Epstein, The Ottoman Jewish Communities and their Role in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1980; =Islamkundliche Untersuchungen, 56).
The scepticism of humanists and converted scholars was not sufficient to suppress this prophetic tale. Indeed, their explicit references to it, their re-arrangement or even rejection of it suggest that the legend of the Red Jews was well-known in early 16th-century Germany, and widely believed. It was a versatile story; it contained elements that meshed with both Jewish and Christian apocalyptic hopes and fears. The fit is exact: the Antichrist awaited by the Christians would be preceded and aided by the Red Jews; the Jews proposed that the Messiah would be supported by the Ten Tribes -- from the German point of view, the frightening Red Jews.

5. Beyond the Reformation: The Turkish Threat through Red Lenses

Neither the refutations published by Victor von Carben and Antonius Margarîtha, Agricola’s concentrated opposition to the legend of the Red Jews nor Luther’s reassignment of the Red Jews to a distant past expunged the theme from apocalyptic thinking about the world and current as well as final events. Even though a member of the circle around Luther took the trouble to dismiss the Red Jews as a fable, and Luther dismissed the immediate threat they had been thought to pose

5. Understood in the traditional, popular Christian sense, conflated with Gog and Magog as the peoples enclosed by Alexander.
for the last three hundred years by making them the ancestors of the immediately-threatening Turks, the theme lived on in popular notions about the East.

Another German pamphlet, published at the end of a decade of intermittent war between the Ottoman and Holy Roman Empires (as well as Ottoman conflicts with Persia), in 1562,\(^6\) tells a similar story, but mentions only Red Jews.\(^7\) All three versions of this pamphlet purport to have been printed in 'Constantinople', probably Nuremberg.\(^8\) They concentrate on the threat posed to the Turks and their empire by a huge army of 'Red Jews' clearly identified in these pamphlets as descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel, who intend to take the Holy Land. The 1562 pamphlets, more so than the 1523 ones, tell a clear story about the exiled tribes and their return to

---

\(^6\) A peace treaty was signed by Emperor Ferdinand I and Süleyman I on 1 July, 1562.

\(^7\) Neuwe Zeitung, //Von dem grossen Heer//der roten Juden, so auß den Gebir//=gen, Caspii genant, in Asia//=herfür kommen, Constantinopel 1562, Zentralbibliothek Zürich 27.471a5. There is another copy at Greifswald according to Emil Weller, Die ersten deutschen Zeitungen. With a bibliography for the years 1505-1599 (=BLVS, 111), Tübingen, 1872, 173, nos. 253/4. According to A. Heyer, there was another version at Breslau (Wroclaw) in two copies, with a slightly different title: "Dritte Nachlese zu Weller's deutschen Zeitungen", in: Fünftes Beiheft zum Centralblatt für Bibliothekwesen, ed. Dr. O. Hartwig, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1890-91), II, 9.

\(^8\) A comparison of contemporary typefaces suggests that ZB Zürich 27.471a5 was printed by Johann vom Berg and Ulrich Neuber of Nuremberg. Many thanks to Mr. Ulrich Kopp of the Herzog August Bibliothek, Wolfenbüttel.
conquer Jerusalem as apocalyptic precursors of the Messiah -- though the author admits he does not understand this part at all! Again, current concerns about the Turks are fitted into a traditional, pre-existing apocalyptic framework, a part of the legend of the Red Jews, which is no longer entirely clear to the author of the 1562 pamphlets.

Details concerning the aristocratic leaders, their troops, their martial equipment and lavish accoutrements (banners and standards with embroidered mottos, colorful silks and large regiments of cavalry) are in no way unusual or peculiar to this account. The good order, excellent equipment and large numbers of men under arms mirror western perceptions of Ottoman military might, especially the austere and

---

6. See the German text and my English translation of these pamphlets in Appendix A, no. 19.

7. "And these Red Jews are said to be those concerning whom the Histories relate that Alexander the Great left behind him in the Caspian Mountains a new people of Jews, who had worshipped the [golden] calf and the snake, and since then stayed together in those mountains so closely that no-one has heard of them since, nor could anyone reach them, on account of the sand in the sea called the Sandy Sea. Their language is said to be bastard or corrupt Hebrew. The Jews have a prophecy, concerning which they say that the prophet Daniel speaks of the fourth part or corner of the world. This part will rise up, and the Messiah will come and rule the world, but what this is, I do not understand, yet their might is said to be appalling and unbelievable. The Turk is greatly threatened by them, as they are said not to have come to the Turkish border, but their intent is to go straight to the Holy Land, which they call the Promised Land, with the plan of refounding their kingdom, that is Jewry." See Appendix A, no. 19, fol. aiii', lines 2-25.
professional organization of the enormous Turkish armies. Luther and his contemporaries saw the Turks as God’s rod and scourge; here they are merely players among others in international power-politics. Indeed, in the 1562 pamphlet, the Ottoman empire itself seems to be threatened by the awesome power of the Red Jews. The apocalyptic element has not disappeared: the Red Jews may have skilled artisans who can make fire fall from the heavens with fireworks, but the Jews of “Constantinople and elsewhere in this land” are said to be secretly delighted by the news that the Red Jews are marching to Jerusalem. Jewish Messianic hopes (and Christian

"1. For example, Luther remarks “Des Türken Macht ist sehr groß, als der zwey Mal hundert tausend Kriegsvolk Jahr und Tag besolden und erhalten kann; muß aufs Wenigste dazu haben zwey tausend Mal tausend Gülden, jährlich. Das türkische Reich stehet auf lauter Kriegern; wir Deutsche aber sind zärtliche Märtyrer, vermögen nichts, sind mit vielen und mancherleyen Herrschaften beschweret”. WAT 1.449,42-45. One reason for this is the position of the Sultan: “Er ist sehr mächtig, vermag viel Volks; ist ein wohlgebüter und versuchter Kriegsmann, sehr weise; sieget ob und überwindet mit künstlichen Anschläge und Rath; verschonet seiner Leute; erhält sein Volk in Gunst und bey gutem Willen; zeucht unbedächtig nicht aus zu Felde noch schlägt, er sehe denn seinen Vorteil; er bricht den Feinden gemächlich ab, zauset und rupft sie einzeln.” WAT 1.454,46 - 455,4.

"2. Göllner, Turcica III, 176-186. One does not attempt to ward off God’s just and well-deserved punishments.

"3. “The Jews here in Constantinople and elsewhere in this land are secretly extremely pleased by this news. And although no-one else has been able to get to this people [the Red Jews], the Jews have always had secret relations with them.” See Appendix A, no. 19, fol. aiii’, lines 13-17."
knowledge of them) concerning the Ten Tribes can be assumed to be the background to this remark. 'The Turk' is threatened, though the Red Jews have not yet reached the Turkish borders, for they plan to go straight to Jerusalem and re-establish their kingdom there. Even imagining a (rather modern) reader who would not immediately associate such a kingdom with the advent of Antichrist, a powerful Jewish kingdom centered on Jerusalem would have meant a complete political and spiritual realignment in the Middle East and Europe.

This pamphlet was published during the height of the persecutions directed at Turcoman tribesmen of the heretical sect of the Kızılbash, from 1558 to 1565.\(^4\) The Kızılbash Turcomans originally were concentrated in Anatolia and the Taurus mountains; their anti-establishment cult later spread to the Turcomans of the Balkans, especially the Yürük Turcomans between the Vize and the Danube and the Turcomans of eastern Bulgaria, southern Macedonia and Thessaly.\(^5\) These nomads rejected Ottoman attempts to settle and tax them; their fervent adherence to dervish orders that professed a form of Islam modified by tribal customs and shamanistic beliefs was a further stumbling block to 'integration'. The name Kızılbaş means 'red heads', and refers to the red headgear they wore as a sign of their heterodoxy. They first rose against Ottoman agents in the highlands of western Anatolia in 1511. It is conceivable that the venerable legend of the Red Jews and their concerted efforts to reach Jerusalem were conflated with reports of flesh-and-blood 'red-headed' enemies of the Turks, the Turcoman Kızılbaş of Asia Minor. However, I have discovered no further sources or evidence that would support this speculation.

\(4\). Inalcık, The Ottoman Empire, 183.

\(5\). Inalcık, The Ottoman Empire, 194. In the second half of the sixteenth century, the Kızılbash embraced a form of Shi’ite heresy oriented toward the ancestor of the Safavid dynasty, Safiyy al-Din of Ardabil (1252-1334), which helped propel them into the Persian orbit.

In the normal course of events, the politics and wars of eastern Europe rarely intrude on the history written about the West. Only epochal phenomena, such as the cresting waves of the Barbarian, Mongol or Turkish invasions -- once they reach central or western Europe -- have overcome the introspective tendency of western historians. The Long War (1593-1606) was one of the most important conflicts pitting the Ottoman Empire against Christendom, especially as concerns Hungary, yet the important events that took place in Asia Minor have not captured the imagination of historians in the way the Ottoman victory at the Battle of Mohacs (1526) has done.

Tatar participation in eastern European power politics has rarely been noticed by western historians. Crimean Tatars

---

"Inalcik, The Ottoman Empire, 32."
had been involved in Ottoman politics at least since the middle of the fifteenth century, when Ottoman expansion began to encroach on these descendants of the great Khans. Tatar revolts against their new masters were not infrequent; they participated in the civil war of 1511, and a revolt was occasioned in 1584 by the replacement of their Khan with another more amenable to the Porte. The Tatar general Gazi Giray (later Khan) provided important services to the Sultan during the Persian War (1578-1590), which left the Turks in control of the Caucasus.

In the context of the Long War, the Tatars proved to be valuable allies of the Ottoman Empire. Turkish successes in Hungary in the summer of 1594 were followed by revolts in Moldavia, Wallachia and Transylvania. Gazi Giray had territorial ambitions in this area. The death of Sultan Murad III on January 16, 1595 led eventually to the replacement of his close friend Gazi Giray in 1596, by his successor Mehmed III (1595-1603). However, the Tatars were to be central to Ottoman attempts to suppress the Balkan revolts in 1594-95. Gazi Giray returned to Crimea in early 1595 and remained there.

---

until persuaded to help the hard-pressed Ottoman forces detailed to put down the revolt in the eastern Balkans. By spring of 1595, the Poles had heard that the Tatars and Ottomans were on the march again, and mobilized their forces.
The Poles were not pleased by Habsburg influence in Transylvania, nor did they want to see the Danube principalities become Ottoman provinces. The Khan did not cross the Dnieper westwards until October. He then marched into Moldavia, up to the Polish lines, which were near the confluence of the Cecora and Prut rivers. After a brief sham battle, negotiators concluded an agreement on October 22, 1595. From this confused and confusing time of thrust and counter-thrust, one of the first newspapers to be published on a regular basis recorded the Polish call to arms in aid of the Voivode and against the Turkish forces:

"The Polish nobility is called to arms against the Tartars: On the last day of the month of May, a public announcement was made in Cracow with beating of drums, and the Polish nobility was called upon for the third time to take arms and march against the Tartars, who with an innumerable horde and horrible force wish to break out;
they have with them 40,000 Turks or Red Jews."\(^{100}\)

The Tatars (Tartars) are the reason for this call to arms;
their army includes 'Turks or Red Jews'. Given Luther’s

\(^{100}\) Cortepeter, Ottoman Imperialism, 142-145.

\(^{101}\) Konrad Memmius, Calendarii Historici //Relatio, for June of 1595; printed at Walstatt, 1595. See Appendix A, no.
20.
conflation of the Tatars with Red Jews, this is not an unprecedented identification, but it is not usual, either. This description is reminiscent of the 500 Red Jews said to be in the army of the Dauphin at Montbéliard in the previous century: the term may refer to any savage people, or simply to the Tatars themselves. The term 'Red Jews might conceivably have referred, in this context, to the Kızılbaş, but they were unlikely members of a Tatar force aligned with the Turks. The medieval term seems to have been used more for its shock value than as a precise description of a certain people: the author is not even sure whether they are Turks or Red Jews. The epithet may then be understood as a kind of fossil, its original intent unknown or just barely perceived, its potential uses manifold and shifting according to the perspective of the observer.

In 1596, another set of 'Red Jews pamphlets' appeared in the midst of this protracted conflict between the Ottoman Empire and the West. These pamphlets are derived from those of 1562; in fact, they are reproductions or re-editions made for different circumstances, namely the latest war. Here, the Red Jews attack the Turks from the East, to aid Christendom. There are two versions of the 1596 pamphlet.\(^1\)

\(^1\) "Zwo warhaftige neue Zeitung, Die Erste, Aus Venedig, dis 1596. Jars ... Wie drey Legion rothe Juden, auß dem Gebirg Caspis; hinder dem rothen Meer, jetzundt gerüst herfür kommen. Welche Keyser Alexander Magnus hinder sich im
The details of the Three Legions pamphlet\textsuperscript{103} are a further and independent development of the 1562 pamphlets. The Red Jews are a people among others, no savage or bloodthirsty cannibals. They are well-armed and protected by sturdy leather armor. Their silken banners and 'Japanese' (Japonisch) accoutrements convey the fragrance of the exotic east, not the stench of unclean barbarians. Moreover, their campaign is not an all-out war of destruction, but a chivalrous (ritterlich) undertaking to drive the Turk from their fatherland.\textsuperscript{104}

\textsuperscript{103} Gebirg verschlossen gelassen hat ... In gesang weiß gestellet... Die ander Zeitung. Wie ... der grosse Fürst auß Siebenbürgen ein ... Schlacht ... gethan ... Geschehen diß 96. Jahr." At the end: "Gedruckt zu Wien in Oesterreich bey Leonhart Nassinger." Cited by Emil Weller, \textit{Die ersten deutschen Zeitungen}, no. 825 (350); hereafter the 'Three Legions pamphlet'. The other version from this year is Weller's no. 824: "Zwo warhaffte wunder seltzame neuwe Zeitung. Die Erste: Wie hundert mal tausend, vnd sechs vnd neunzig tausent Juden ... vom Berg Caspin, dem Türcken in das Landt gefallen ... auß Venedig, Rom, Constantinopel, im Julio vnd Augusto deß 96. Jars warhafftig geschrieben, Liederweiß gestellet ... Die Ander: Von einer ... Wörder Geschicht ... Gedruckt zu Lindaw am Bodensee, bey Hans Ludwig Brem."; hereafter the '196,000 Jews pamphlet'. Both versions were in the Royal Library at Berlin, and were very probably destroyed or lost during the second World War, but their texts have been preserved, by a lucky chance, in a privately published booklet from the turn of the century: Heinrich Loewe, \textit{Zur Runde der Juden im Kaukasus}. See my transcriptions and translations in Appendix A, nos. 21 a and b.

\textsuperscript{104} "Listen now you Christians, young, poor or rich, I will sing to you of God's great miracles, that came to pass recently. When we reckoned the year 1596, an honest merchant came from across the Red Sea to Venice, and told the city council this tale. He brought wondrous news of Red Jews beyond
Alexander the Great appears once again in this account: the Red Jews are still said to have been enclosed by him in the Caspian Mountains. In fact, this people is not altogether domesticated; they have wild beasts with them and are quite dangerous to the world at large. "God (alone) knows what this expedition means. Few Christians know about these Red Jews who come from behind the Red Sea, and pose a great threat to the Turks." The clear danger is to the Turks: the Red Jews are God's scourge to humiliate the enemies of Christendom. Yet the fear born of ignorance is still strong, and the author prays for deliverance 'just in case'.

\[
\text{the sea, who were enclosed long ago in the Caspian Mountains, and who intend to take up arms for a bitter battle. They have armed themselves and have marched in all their might against the Turk, across the Caspian Mountains. Hear now what I sing you, for it is true, no trumped-up tale. The Jews and their bold troops marched over the mountains arrayed in all their might, to take a stand in chivalrous fashion. They wanted to drive the Turks out of the Jewish lands with all their might. Emperor Alexander the Great enclosed these Jews in the mountains. They have multiplied greatly. They are three legions in total, as you have already heard." See Appendix A, no. 21a, page 2, line 3 - page 3, line 2.}
\]

\[
\text{"They have panthers with them and pose a serious danger to everyone. God (alone) knows what this expedition means. Few Christians know about these Red Jews who come from behind the Red Sea, and pose a great threat to the Turks. May God resist the Turks, and humiliate them by means of the Red Jews. Therefore, dear Christians, ask God for his mercy, that he may yet prolong our lives. And you Christians all ask diligently for his grace, that he always mercifully avert the [just] punishment, so that we can come to a blessed end after surviving these trying times." See Appendix A, no. 21a, page 4, lines 1-12. On the translation 'may God resist the Turks' see chapter I.}
\]
The other 1596 version, the 196,000 Jews pamphlet, also goes beyond the message of the 1562 pamphlets. However, it is quite different from the Three Legions edition. Here, the Red Jews reject Turkish demands for tribute, slaughter the Turkish bag-men, then set out to conquer the Holy Land. The Jewish armies are enormous: the main host consists of 900,000 men, an inflated variant of the usual Biblical figure of 600,000. They are well-equipped and armed, protected by leather cuirasses, and backed by tens of thousands of horsemen and crossbowmen. The slogan on the banner of the war-leader of Issachar, the ‘Count of Altz’, suggests that the Red Jews have allied themselves with the Christians against the Turks. Confused echoes of the 1562 pamphlets and the Three Legions

---

106. I.e., Weller 324.

107. "He [the Sultan] sent his legates swiftly to the wild mountains of Caspin, to order the Jews there to pay their tax quickly, so that the good Great Turk could vent his spleen and cool his raging heart with innocent Christian blood. When these legates had said their piece, the Jews surrounded them and stabbed them all, to a man, and on the strength of this deed took a firm decision to conquer the Promised Land, and to attack [their enemies] heartily and in a lively fashion. ‘Lerman, Lerman’ they sang, all through the land. The Jews jumped for joy, they were wild and crazy with joy. They all of them wanted to be the cock of the walk and grab their future happiness, promised to them since the world began." See Appendix A, no. 21b, page 2, lines 18-29.

108. "On his banner, worked finely in gold, shine forth the words: I risk everything on the occasion, it must be attempted. Straight off I’ll bind the Turkish dog with my chains; from now on will I happily ally myself with the Christians." See Appendix A, no. 21b, page 3, lines 23-28.
pamphlet can be discerned; but most noteworthy are the suggestion of alliance with the Christians and the claim that a siege army of Jews has surrounded Constantinople and is attacking the Turks daily, and plans to conquer the Promised Land next! "God alone knows the meaning of his miracles and this great campaign"; all that is clear is that the Jews are there to punish the Turks. However, the author suggests that the Jewish campaign is part of the final process by which all Jews and Muslims will be converted to Christ, before the Last Days, as Scripture foretells. The Red Jews have ceased to be apocalyptic destroyers; they are an aggrieved party that fights back and plays politics, making an alliance with the Christians against the present enemy, even as it plays its divinely-appointed role -- one that threatens not the 'good

"Is it not a great wonder (o pious Christian, take note) that the Jews have now arrayed around Constantinople a large host of Jews who attack the Turks daily, and wish to conquer the Promised Land next? They brought a great surplus with them on campaign, so that they should lack for nothing.
Their marvelous land is exceedingly rich in all varieties of foodstuffs. They cast into that fortress fire-works that burn for four hours. It is also written that the wild Red Sea stood still for a month, until their entire army had passed through it. Take note of God's power from this instance. He alone knows what this deed signifies. Christ and the prophets announced to us long ago that the Mohammedan[s] and the Jewish rabble will take on the Christian faith entirely, and there will be one shepherd and one sheepfold. Scripture tells clearly about the Last Day [Doomsday]. O Jesus, dear Lord, break the might of the Turks, increase the Christian faith, convert the Jews, give peace and good accord, save us from all suffering. Your name alone is holy, on earth as in heaven for ever and ever. Amen." See Appendix A, no. 21b, page 4, lines 3-28.
Christians' but the 'evil Turks'.

News of war in the east very clearly was the occasion for these popular musical reworkings of a very old interpretive schema. The apocalyptic and antisemitic currents of the late medieval tradition are submerged here; the Red Jews are allies of Christendom. It would seem that these Red Jews, at least, are not Tatars: in 1596, the Tatar forces of Gazi Giray marched southwest once more to attack the Polish client Jeremia Movile, voivode of Moldavia; the brother of Gazi Giray, the Kalgay Feth Giray, played an important role in the battle of Mező Kerésztés. In both cases, the Tatars were fighting on the Ottoman side. Yet there is considerable room for confusion in these matters. The Red Jews of the 1596 pamphlets might well represent the Tatars; certainty is impossible.

Between the late Middle Ages and subsequent eras there was, in regard to the popular legend of the Red Jews, a certain continuity, as well as a distinct gap. The author of the 1562 pamphlets betrays both his incomprehension and his dependence on tradition or authority in reproducing the details of a fading legend. As in 1523, the concrete reality of the Turkish menace is addressed. The Red Jews are an immediate threat not to Christendom, but to the Turks, from whom they want the Holy Land. The 1596 pamphlets are based to a large extent on those of 1562. In the later pamphlets, the medieval tradition has receded, and the Red Jews are put to very different uses. The occasion for the pamphlets is clear and immediate. The 1596 version of the tale probably resulted more from wishful thinking than from actual knowledge of the situation in Asia Minor. In 1596, the Red Jews are identified as the peoples enclosed by Alexander (unlike the 1523 and 1562 pamphlets, where this detail was not included). This identification establishes a clear link with the medieval tradition, even though its most important antisemitic and apocalyptic elements have disappeared. A reference to the Red Sea, missing in all previous mentions of the Red Jews, appears in the Three Legions pamphlet -- perhaps to help explain the term red, which seems to have been familiar but not understood. By 1596, the remnants of the medieval legend were reaching a very broad audience, as shown by the context in which the Red Jews appear in 1596: the tale is set to music, rhymed, printed with a battle report in one version, and with a story about a murder in the other. The Red Jews pose no immediate threat to Christendom in these pamphlets. Apocalyptic overtones are no longer overt, or even, perhaps, intended: the Red Jews attack the Turks, with whom the Christian West was at war. It would seem that as this material percolated down to the broadest levels of society in rhyming newsballads, it remained 'good to think with', even as it came unstuck from the traditional mentalities and theological underpinnings (both learned and popular) in which it originally flourished, took on very different meanings that seem not to have lasted in the popular imagination, and gradually disappeared from view. The Red Jews may not have made much sense to pamphleteers who confess that only God knows the meaning of their march, but these exotic figures of medieval legend still were being used to make sense of events in the East: though these events were on the surface unheard-of and incomprehensible, they could nonetheless be rendered familiar in the typological terms of salvation history as the beginning of the End.

---

To insist on similarities, the 1523, 1562 and 1596 pamphlets agree in associating the Red Jews with the Ten Tribes. Until at least 1596, the myth of the Red Jews was a powerful factor in German-language pamphlet propaganda aimed at a wide audience. These pamphlets were not written in a cultural vacuum. Indeed, they can be understood only when placed in relation to: the fast-receding background of middle High German literature and biblical exegesis; medieval Latin works of theology and chronicles; ancient Jewish tradition; and the historical context in which each set of pamphlets was produced.
If we ask why the Red Jews survived so long into the sixteenth century, we must also be prepared to answer why they disappeared. The decades between Luther's relegation of the Red Jews to ancient history and the 1596 pamphlets brought tremendous changes. The disbelief expressed by Agricola and Luther's historicizing incorporation into his apocalyptic vision of a popular legend could not suppress or relativize the legend of the Red Jews, but they were the thin edge of the debunking wedge. As Robin Barnes has demonstrated in his ground-breaking study of apocalypticism after the Lutheran Reformation, prophetic hopes and the calculation of the approaching End Time that had been so central a part of the medieval understanding of the world and time -- and which were based on an authentic yearning for the resolution of all uncertainty, danger and fear -- gradually disappeared in the early seventeenth century. The Thirty Years' War, which brought about not the long-awaited cosmic changes, but devastation and a long uphill struggle for the survivors, put an end to this simultaneously hopeful and fearful tradition of religious futurology. While the Red Jews 'descended' into "The prophetic dreams and reckonings of the time were already beginning to discredit themselves in the early seventeenth century. But the process was greatly hastened by the Thirty Years' War; that holocaust did much to end the last great age of apocalyptic hope in Germany." Barnes, Prophecy and Gnosis. Apocalypticism in the Wake of the Lutheran Reformation (Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1988), 265.

popular rhyming news-sheets, the Biblical story of Gog and Magog grabbed center stage once again, partly as a result of Luther’s interpretation of the Turks as the final destroyers. The Ten Tribes -- the existence of which at least could be deduced from the Bible -- continued to fascinate Christendom. The Red Jews are not mentioned in the Bible;

12. Barnes has suggested that the shared ‘apocalyptic world-view’ of all classes of urban society in the sixteenth century "may actually have been a unifying force in German town life, forming a bridge between popular culture and the world of the learned. Judging from the pervasiveness of apocalyptic hopes, fears, and expectations, learned and popular culture may not have been as separate as we are sometimes led to believe." Barnes, Prophecy and Gnosis, 264. The evidence adduced in this study tends to suggest that this portrait of a shared ‘apocalyptic world-view’ is too simplistic; there were significant differences in the content of apocalyptic beliefs, no matter how widespread apocalyptic belief was; these differences correspond to the clear divide, on the question of the Red Jews, between learned and popular views that was foreshadowed by Victor von Carben, confirmed explicitly by Agricola and implicitly by the sixteenth century pamphlets, and stated forcefully once again at the beginning of the seventeenth century; see below, this chapter.

13. See, for example, the Historia von der Geburt // Leben/Sitten/Kühnheit/Tu- // genden ... Alexanders (des Groß genannt) Königs in Macedonien (Frankfurt am Main, 1573), with a "Vorred Doctor Hartliebs von München" and "Proloqu Eusebii" (Wolfenbüttel T 465.8" Helmst.), in which Alexander encounters the 'Ten Tribes of the Captivity' when he reaches the Caspian Mountains; he decides to enclose and lock them up 'better' than they were. One reads, the author notes, that the Antichrist will lead them out of their prison at the end of time, to do great damage to all of Christendom (fol. Lii', 5-15 and Lii'). In the same work, Alexander’s journey to India begins with the words "König Alexander zeucht mit seinem Heer in Rot Indien" (fol. Dd vii', line 1); in lines 5-8 we read "Wir kamen mit all unserm Heer unnd Volck zu dem grossen hohen Gebirg das man nennt Portas Caspias, das ist, der Roten Indien Land, daselbst fand ich das ubervolldest Land an aller the term was traditional but had become, by 1562 at the latest, both mysterious and exotic to Germans. The exotic is by definition not unknown, only known insufficiently for it to be familiar. We are used, after five centuries of 'discovery', to the process by which the exotic becomes familiar; the gnugsame, daß ich mich inniglichen daran verwundert." The author seems to have confused the Red Jews (Rote Juden/Indien), who are traditionally believed to live behind the 'Portas Caspias' with Indians, who then are called Red Indians (Rote Indien), a mistake that typography rather suggests. European perceptions of the bronze-red skin color of American native peoples may also have played a part, via a failure to distinguish between the east and west Indies. This type of confusion would not be unique in this work, in which Jews are read into other portions where tradition does not place them: e.g., the army of the Persian king Darius is said, for the first time in the millenial history of the Alexander story, to contain Jews (fol. M viii''); even after receiving reinforcements from 'Porrus', the king of India, Darius' army, now 600,000 strong, attacks Alexander, but "das halff alles klein, dann es kamen alle tag andere an die statt, dann die Juden wußten nicht die krafft, kunst und sig der Griechen" (fol. N vi'-N vii'); furthermore, "Die Juden begerten den Schatz Alexanders zuverdienen" (ibid., line 11); the Greeks "erstachen der Juden unnd Persen so viel, daß sie vor den Todten nicht mochten fürbaß kommen (ibid., lines 19-20); the Greeks "gewannen das kostlich Baner der Juden, das ward auch erstritten mit nöten." (ibid., lines 25-27). It seems to me that these martial Jews are none other than a faded echo of the Red Jews, since Jews had never before been mentioned as members of any army other than that of the Ten Tribes. The author would, in this case, have folded the German tradition of the Red Jews into the Alexander story. His version of the latter would have been one of those that retained the older, Comestorine designation 'Ten Tribes' for 'Gog-and-Magog-enclosed by Alexander'; the attribute 'red' made no particular sense to him, so it bled off into the typographically-close term for 'Indians'; the Biblical number 600,000 and the war-like characteristics of the Red Jews found employment in the army not of the Antichrist, but of Alexander’s Persian enemy Darius.

opposite process, with its undercurrent of what we might be tempted to see as decay, seems unlikely to us. Of course, the Red Jews, had always been an 'exotic' (as well as threatening) people. They became more so as they disappeared from mainstream culture as mediated by mainstream printing. To their heightened exoticism was added, in the later sixteenth century, the aura of mystery that shrouds beliefs that have slipped into partial oblivion: the modern fascination with vampires, ghosts and demons (or the 'paranormal') is an example of the numinous cloud that can attend half-understood remnants of beliefs that had once been 'common knowledge'.

Perhaps the expulsion of the Jews from western Europe and much of central Europe helped to defuse this established antisemitic and apocalyptic vision of the Jews: yet antisemitism has rarely suffered from the absence of its object -- indeed, it often has become more vicious in the absence of Jews or of knowledge about them. Rather, the decline in intensity and scope of apocalyptic belief, and thus the uncoupling of the Jews from German visions of the end, can be ascribed to the failure of the much-prophesied End to materialize, despite the most urgent warnings, the perception -- in the midst of the interminable and bloody Wars of Religion -- that the world had never been more in need of God’s fundamental reformatio, and the large number of seeming 'opportunities' (large-scale wars and the ensuing destruction of all existing order) for the final reckoning. The continued existence of a patently wicked world, a more cynical, pragmatic approach to political events, even the apparent defencelessness and expulsions of European Jewry may all have played a part in the dissipation of this powerful medieval legend. Tradition was no match, ultimately, for the combined forces of Biblical learning, skeptical analysis, and the oblivion produced by the passing of time.

Before they disappeared altogether from Christian Germany, the Red Jews would put in two more appearances, in 1607 and 1608. They are depicted as the objects of a superstitious fable:

"Many Jews believe that the Ten Tribes, whom the king Salmanassar led away, are still together, and live behind the dark mountains called the Caspian Mountains. [...] Many Christians also talk a great deal about the Red Jews, whom they have never seen, whence comes the wrong-headed notion that the Messiah might still be born from the tribe of Judah, from the Red Jews."\(^{14}\)

'Many Christians' still believed in the existence of the apocalyptic Red Jews. The learned author (another Jewish convert to Christianity) claims that such beliefs are just as baseless as Jewish belief in the continued existence of the Ten Tribes, which he distinguishes clearly from the Christian legend of the Red Jews -- a legend that was still popular in his time, he claims. The divide between learned and popular culture on the question of the Red Jews, which was foreshadowed by Victor von Carben and confirmed by Agricola, is by this time complete and incontrovertible: only Jews and many 'wrong-headed' Christians believe apocalyptic (messianic) stories concerning the Red Jews.

\(^{14}\) Der Juden Thalmud, by Christian Gerson of Recklingshausen (a Jewish convert to Christianity), (Goslar, 1607; Wolfenbüttel Gv 676), esp. part II, 390-398: "Ettliche Juden meinen zwar, und glauben, die Zehen Stemme, welche der ko'nig Salmanesser hinweg gefüret hat, sein noch beyeinander, und wonen hinter dem finsteren Gebirge, Montes Caspos [sic] genandt ... Ettliche Christen wissen auch viel von Rothen Juden, welche sie doch nicht gesehen haben, zu reden, dahero dann der falsche Wahn geschöpftet wird, es könne der Messias noch wol aus dem Stamm Juda, von den Rothen Juden, gebohren werden." (391).

In 1608, a bizarre alchemical text reports on Red Jews, who had been enclosed by Alexander the Great, in the Caspian Mountains. These Jews eat nothing but the best variety of gold, and therefore their sweat is most valuable. The purport of this text is that if one washes and scrubs these Jews, especially the fattest of them, with sufficient vigor, using the right chemical mixtures (Aqua Colaturae Sanguinis Nobilissimi Animalis is a satirical name for such a foul compound) and then filters the bathwater, particles of gold will be left over. These can then be taken to a goldsmith.15

---

This is a satirical jibe at the foolishness of alchemists, using the by-now discredited, 'superstitious' story of the Red Jews to make the pasquille really hilarious: the suggestion is that those who believe in alchemical theories and methods are just as credulous and blind as the dolts who believe in the Red Jews. The image of especially fat Jews 'sweating gold' reproduces the text on page 5, columns a and b. I am indebted to Joseph Dallett for this reference.

Telle is not acquainted with the medieval and early modern tradition of the Red Jews (he knows only the 1562 pamphlet), and is therefore tempted to judge that this text is not a satire, largely because when it was printed in 1608 and reprinted in 1706, it appeared in the company of alchemical texts that were without a doubt serious works ("Was ist ein "roter Jude"?", 6. He displays all the earnest willingness to take texts at face value that can get even the best scholars into trouble. He dismisses without just cause the persuasive arguments of a series of scholars that this text is nothing but a joke or a satire: Hermann Kopp says the author was guilty of 'unseemly derision' ("unziemlicher Spott"; Die Alchemie in älterer und neuerer Zeit. Ein Beitrag zur Kulturgeschichte, Heidelberg 1886, reprint Hildesheim/New York, 1971, 237); Karl Sudhoff called the text an 'alchemical satire' ("alchemistisches Scheimenstück"; Bibliographia Paracelsica. Besprechung der unter Hohenheims Namen 1527-1893 erschienenen Druckschriften [Berlin 1904, reprint Graz, 1958]; Nr. 283, 484). Hermann Schelenz emphasized the 'rough humor' ("derber Witz") accompanying the 'nonsense of making gold out of organic material' ("der Unsinn [...] der Darstellung des Goldes aus tierischen Stoffen"; Geschichte der Pharmazie, [Berlin 1904, reprint Hildesheim 1965], 248). Herwig Buntz called it a parody, a satirical text, in which 'disappointed adepts' 'gave vent to their anger and frustration' ("enttäuschte Adepten" wollten ihrem "Ärger Luft machen"; Deutsche alchimistische Traktate des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts" [Ph.D. dissertation, Munich 1968], 56 and "Die europäische Alchemie vom 13. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert, in: Emil Ernst Ploss et al., Alchimia. Ideologie und Technologie [Munich 1970], 198).
when treated roughly is a savagely humorous reference to an age-old method of extracting money from Jews, the most vulnerable of the very few medieval Europeans who had access to actual cash, however small the amounts. The message is that you would get richer looking for the fabled Red Jews in the Caspian Mountains than you will by practising alchemy.

After this time, the legend of the Red Jews and their

18. One of the most famous examples is Philip Augustus' expulsion of the Jews in the early fourteenth century. According to John Baldwin, "Philip's despoiling of the Jews at the opening of his reign was, however, an extraordinary measure that realized massive gains in ransoms (31,500 livres), expropriation of debts [20% of book value to Crown], and confiscation of [the Jews' landed] property. In all likelihood, his Jewish policy was the expedient for financing the political program of the first decade [of his ambitious and belligerent foreign policy]." The Government of Philip Augustus. Foundations of French Power in the Middle Ages (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986), 55. See Andrew Gow and Gordon Griffiths, "Pope Eugenius IV and Jewish Money-Lending in Florence: the case of Salomone di Bonaventura during the chancellorship of Leonardo Bruni", in: Renaissance Quarterly, 1994 (in press) for a detailed study of the same process on a smaller scale, involving the expropriation of the assets of a single Jewish banking family.
name disappear completely from the German sources; there is no reason to think that belief in the Red Jews lasted beyond the fundamental dislocations of the Thirty Years War. There was no need of Jewish destroyers from the exotic east when fellow-Christians from the next county or the next country seemed all too willing to play the dreaded role.

In the seventeenth century, especially as the portentously-numbered year 1666 approached, the apocalyptic specter of the Ten Tribes and of Gog and Magog appeared in numerous polemical works aimed at shocking a sinful Germany into repentance before it was too late. 19 The Red Jews were

19. See, for example, the Letzte (Tu'rcken) Posaum u'ber Deutschland, Die in verdammliche Sicherheit versunkene Welt vo Su'n'den-Schlaff auffzuwecken (Regensburg 1664; reprinted 1683; Wolfenbüttel Da 605 (25)): "DaB durch die Berge Israelis, darauff Gog und Magog, das ist, der Tu'rcke, nach des Herrn Luther, und anderer Gottseliger Außleger und reinen Theologorum Meinung, kommen und schrecklichen rumoren werde Ezeth. c. 38, v. 8, neben andern Christlichen Provincien sonderlich auch Teutschland verstanden werde, ist kein zweifel." (9, lines 1-4); "Weil die Berge Israelis sind die wahre Kirche, und also vornehmlich Teutschland, da das reine Evangelium fur andern lauter und rein geprediget wird..." (9, 3-10); "Also werden auch der Tu'rcke unser Gog in den letzten Jahren, umb das Ende der Welt, mit seinem so wol Mitta'gisch, in lateribus Aquilonis liegenden Asiatischen, als Mitterna'chtischen Tartarischen, Scythischen, gegen Mitternacht liegenden Vo'lckern auf die Werthe, durch die Berge Israel bedeutete Christenheit ansetzen, und seine Wu'terey wieder die Kirche veru'ben..." (9, lines 22-25). Similar books feature the Ten Tribes: e.g., the Ju'discher Beer-Zug, Das ist: Einfaltige Ju'den-Predigt, Darinnen gehandelt wird, ob die zehen Stämme Israelis das gelobte Land wieder kön'nen besitzen und behaupten, by Johann Rephun, pastor in Thurnau (Bayreuth :1666; Wolfenbüttel 317.63. Th (5)); or the Israelita Revertens Armatus, / verus ne an no longer germane to these prophecies, which grew out of a Biblical piety that looked for the End, but was no longer a part of the medieval apocalyptic tradition that produced the Red Jews.
VII: CONCLUSIONS AND EPILOGUE

1. Conclusions

For over three hundred years, the Red Jews served as a catch-basin and amplifier for prejudices about Jews and fears about the destruction to come at the end of time. They gradually ceased, over the course of the sixteenth century, to perform that function. They are a fragment of submerged 'medievalia', of a vanished world-view or mentality that was capable of what may seem to us bizarre combinations, but which were perceived by many German Christians, from the late thirteenth to the late sixteenth century as a real and immediate threat.

That modern historians no longer recognize the term 'Red Jews' is significant: this gap in our knowledge grows out of a larger denial of cultural continuities between the Middle Ages and the sixteenth century. These continuities escape us precisely because we imagine ourselves to be far removed from the Middle Ages, and because students of the Reformation -- until recently the undisputed leaders in the field of sixteenth-century history -- have tended to look, under the influence both of Burckhardt and of Protestant triumphalism, for the 'modern', i.e., familiar (and therefore mostly 'new') elements in the Reformation, rather than to dig for connections with the medieval past.

Research into the late-medieval origins of the Reformation has concentrated on learned texts and traditions. As Heiko A. Oberman has shown, Luther's writings on the Jews belong with those on the Turks and the Papacy to 'a single indissoluble genre of apocalyptic prophecy'. To Luther and his contemporaries, the End Time would be ushered in by the fury of Gog and Magog, prophesied by Ezekiel and confirmed in Revelations. This was neither a popular fiction nor the private fantasy of a university professor in Wittenberg. There can be no doubt: there is no dividing line here. Drawing on the Hebrew and Christian Bibles, Flavius Josephus, Petrus Comestor, and a widespread vernacular literature, both learned doctors of Scripture and the unlettered looked for the arrival of Gog and Magog as a sign that the Biblical prophecies were about to be fulfilled.

Yet there are different levels in this apocalyptic discourse. Where Luther looked for Gog and Magog, as a well-trained biblical scholar might well do, the common people, including the intermediate figure Michael Kramer, also looked for and were fed stories about the Red Jews. In fact, the sixteenth-century pamphlets studied here do not refer directly... to Gog and Magog at all: the Red Jews carry their own weight. Oberman's analysis addresses popular ideas in the context of the learned and more precisely Biblical apocalyptic expectations of Reformation theology. The sources adduced here allow us to distinguish between these ideas with a view to examining the filtering process by which a Biblical story became a popular legend. Agricola's critique and Luther's historicizing of the Red Jews allow us to conclude that the medieval legend had, by the early sixteenth century, lost its credibility among the educated. It had become a popular story that evoked learned disapproval or prevarication, but continued for some time to generate popular pamphlets that reflected a deeper, widespread belief in the threatened apocalyptic jail-break.

It might be objected that the Red Jews story was just a popular version of the Biblical prophetic tales familiar to learned readers. Yet the tradition of the Red Jews not only drew from very different roots, it also was based on multiple sources. The Red Jews, therefore, were a 'version' of the Biblical Ten Tribes, but also a 'version' of Gog and Magog, and indeed of the foul, cannibalistic peoples in the early Alexander story -- a conflation. The combined religious authority of the Gog and Magog prophecies and the historical authority of the widely-read Alexander story created an explosive mix. The 'Ten Tribes enclosed by Alexander', which Anderson showed to be the more common European variety of this legend, did not pack the same apocalyptic punch; it did not create so vast, so long-lasting and so genuinely popular a vernacular textual tradition as the legend of the Red Jews did in the German-speaking world. The Ten Tribes would have to wait for the next great surge of apocalyptic expectation, in the years leading up to 1666, when the co-ordinates had changed -- the Bible was now universally available in the vernacular tongues, and the use of Latin had declined dramatically -- for a proper vogue in vernacular apocalyptic.

The unusual and symbolic name 'Red Jews' guaranteed their story would continue to be told long after educated European Christians ceased believing that the 'red peril' would devastate Christendom at the end of time. The name itself seems to have contributed to the longevity, among the common people, of the legend it expressed. Furthermore, in the sixteenth century, the Red Jews fulfilled functions with which the Ten Tribes were not associated: the Ten Tribes never were invoked to explain or counter the advances of Turkish might. Aside from the posturing of David Reuben, there never was any rumor of an alliance between the Ten Tribes and Christendom, as there was between the Red Jews and the Christian world in 1596. The medieval legend of the Red Jews faded away, partly because this non-Biblical people was re-integrated or re-amalgamated with one of its sources, the Jewish legend of the Ten Tribes: Victor and Antonius played an important role in rejoining the already odd-sounding Red Jews to the Biblical Ten Tribes. Gog and Magog were, of course, identified with the Turks by Luther and many others before and after him, especially since the fall of Constantinople (1453). That Luther admitted the Turks to be descended from the 'Tattars', who were in turn descendants of the Red Jews, is a tip of the hat in the direction of the medieval legend and of popular belief in his own time. It is characteristic of his critical and practical attitude toward Biblical exegesis: the plain meaning of Scripture, to Luther, concerns things that can be grasped, that are immediate to our senses. The Turks, who were physically near and obviously real, fulfilled this requirement much better than did the fantastical Red Jews, whom no-one had ever seen. Luther's new and to some, shocking, emphasis on direct Biblical study and plain exegesis went hand-in-hand with a re-evaluation of medieval theology and interpretation. The Red Jews were necessarily reassimilated to the Ten Tribes because their apocalyptic role was being re-appropriated by the Biblical destroyers Gog and Magog -- in Luther's eyes, the Turks.

This is a new identification of epochal import. It conforms to the medieval pattern according to which the Mongols or Tatars could be Gog and Magog, or the Ten Tribes, or both: the signs of the times are made to signify events in the eternal history of salvation, and the Turks fit in well.

What is new is the progressive divorce, over the course of the sixteenth century, of the Red Jews from their apocalyptic role. As they become a 'secular' people, despite the apocalyptic undertone of such qualifications as 'only God knows what this all signifies', the Red Jews lose their raison d'être, even as events relating to the apocalyptically-charged military might and eastern city -- the Ottoman Empire and Jerusalem -- continue to be interpreted according to the categories provided by popular tradition, in the form of the Red Jews. In the midst of change, in other words, the Red Jews were a convention that 'made sense' (i.e., they were a necessary part of the subject under discussion) to the authors, and presumably to the buyers, of these much-reprinted pamphlets. Just as the German translator of The Pessl Anonymous and Konrad Steckel inserted the Red Jews into narratives where the vernacular demanded them, so the authors of the sixteenth century pamphlets had a strong notion that the Red Jews belonged in their latter-day narratives. The outside world has always to be 'made sense of' according to 'internal' or at least acquired categories and beliefs about past, present and future.

That the Red Jews had been 'invented' in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries using multiple layers from heterogeneous sources is not a sign of confusion or loose thinking. These stories were so close, the associations between the Messiah awaited by Jews and the Antichrist feared by Christians were so evident, that an exegete used to the effort of harmonizing 'seemingly' contradictory biblical passages was not to be put off by the difference between the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog: they were the same people because they would both play the 'same' role at the end of time. This approximate identification is based on concrete characteristics, not express description. It is pragmatic, not based on explicit principles of exegesis or ratiocination. It is 'good to think with'; whether or not it was Biblical seems not to have mattered to most medieval Christians. Thus, a broadly European apocalypticism gradually absorbed the animus of an equally widespread antisemitism. Biblical and literary material alike were fair game to Comestor and his scholastic and historical imitators, to the courtly poets who borrowed the conflation from the Comestorine tradition and added the pejorative adjective 'red', and to the authors of popular late medieval exegetical works. The name served a distinct programmatic purpose: to identify the Ten Tribes (Jews) with the unclean peoples enclosed by Alexander. These enclosed peoples, utter savages literally beyond the pale of civilization, took on the apocalyptic function of Gog and Magog as well as the Jewishness, and concomitant association with the Antichrist, of the Ten Tribes. The name 'Red Jews' marked them with a specific and pejorative label. From Comestor on, medieval Christians had compelling political and religious reasons (though they may seem specious to us) to identify the ultimate external destroyers of Christendom with those who were coming to be seen as its worst internal enemies -- the Jews. The legend of the Red Jews articulated and propagated a specifically German, antisemitic strain of Christian apocalypticism in the high and later Middle Ages.

In the fifteenth century, the Red Jews moved from high literature and court circles into the world of the towns and book-markets. The Historiated Bibles, the many versions of the Alexander novel and above all, the manuscript, chiroxylographic, xylographic and typographic Antichrist-books reflected a deep-seated and widespread view of the Red Jews as the particular associates of the Antichrist and as the apocalyptic people par excellence.

In the sixteenth century, the Red Jews came to play a slightly different role; their importance to the Apocalypse receded as Gog and Magog took on clearly Turkish features, and as political and military concerns took precedence over apocalyptic fears -- though these worldly concerns were still expressed in terms borrowed from the latter. The Red Jews continued to function as a tradition-sanctioned category for the explanation of mysterious and threatening goings-on in the east amongst the Turks. That the term Red Jews seems to have conveyed very little precise content to the authors of the 1562 and 1596 pamphlets is not as important as the fact that they used it; much of the content had been sapped by Luther’s Türkenschau (understanding of the Turks) and by the beginning process of re-integration into the Biblically-sanctioned story of the Ten Tribes.

Throughout this study, I have distinguished between Latin sources that refer to the Ten Tribes, to Gog and Magog, or to both, and vernacular ('Germanic') sources that spread the legend of the Red Jews. It is impossible to argue that the vernacular sources dating from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries reflect popular belief, as they were written by courtly poets or urban notables for a restricted audience. Yet there was evidently a clear distinction between the beliefs of the Latinate and those of the 'Germanic'. The phrase Red Jews clothed the Comestorine conflation ('Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander' and the Ten Tribes) in an uniquely German fabric. Vernacular letters in Germany had a relatively young but already quite independent tradition, which made room for this creatively hateful version of the Jews' role at the end of time. Although it is impossible to determine with certainty whether or not larger segments of the population believed in the imminent advent of the Red Jews, courtly vernacular poems and early German exegetical works cannot but have helped to spread the legend among broader strata of society. The results of this development started to appear as early as 1349, when the Zurich year-book accuses European Jews of having received the foul plague-poison from the Red Jews -- from which we can assume a fairly widespread knowledge of the 'red peril'. The ripening of the medieval legend among the 'better sort' of the common people occurred in the fifteenth century, when the Historiated Bibles, a rather formal variety of vernacular exegesis, were followed by the much more informal or story-like manuscript Antichrist-book, then by its many printed editions, reaching ever-broader segments of society as prices fell and printing runs grew. The peak of the harvest and the simultaneous onset of a slow decay came in the sixteenth century, when popular pamphlets made the medieval legend available -- or reflected it back to -- much larger social groups than could ever before have been reached (whether by popular pamphlets or by the blundering investigations of modern historians). The content of the legend mutated under the influence of more informed anti-Jewish polemic (provided by converts like Victor von Carben and Antonius Margaritha), Reformation Biblicism, the press of war and politics, and finally, the sheer weight of time and forgetfulness.

2. Epilogue

The German legend of the Red Jews, a relative latecomer, was to disappear from the Christian West entirely. The Ten Tribes, however, who can at least be interpreted or squeezed out of Biblical passages, were to have a long and illustrious career in European and later in American speculative theology, history and geography. Manasseh ben Israel was to use the theme in Cromwell's time (in 1648) in his efforts to gain readmission for the Jews to England. Thomas Thorowgood published a book entitled Jewes in America, or Probabilities that the Americans are of that Race (London 1650). Over the course of the following two centuries, the Ten Tribes were 'found' in all parts of the world, from the Orinoco to Ohio, from the upper reaches of the Nile to the upper reaches of New York State. But as apocalyptic expectations cooled and

... See Wolf, Menasseh Ben-Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell. The title of Manasseh's work, reprinted by Wolf, is The Hope of Israel (London 1650). Manasseh was convinced that the inhabitants of the Americas were the scattered descendants of the Ten Tribes. When all the lands of the world should have been settled by Jews, the ingathering and redemption of Israel, a prerequisite for the Last Judgment, could begin. In his appeal to Cromwell, Manasseh argued that allowing the return of the Jews to England (they had been excluded from that country since 1291) would help fulfill the prophecies concerning the End Time.

James Adair's History of the American Indians (London, 1775) detailed supposed similarities between the Indians, the Jews and the ancient Israelites. Joseph Smith, prophet and founder of the Mormon church (Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter-Day Saints) also posited the descent of the American aboriginals from the Ten Tribes. According to the Book of Mormon (1830), the lost Israelites voyaged to America, where Jesus preached to them. For further details of nineteenth-century searches for the Ten Tribes, see Godbey, The Ten Tribes: A Myth? and Weil, Beyond the Sambatyon: The Myth of the Ten Lost Tribes, 35-82 (Hebrew numbering).
gradually subsided, at least in mainstream Christianity, the Ten Tribes lost their eschatological nimbus and became curiosities, the sort of thing that resulted in earnest scholarly searches for the exiled Israelites.

But what of the Red Jews? In 1748, a Jewish convert to the Lutheran faith who had become a pastor at Eschenberga (in the principality of Gotha), Friedrich Albrecht Augusti, published a series of letters he claims to have exchanged with Jews whose purpose was to confuse him and lead him back to the Mosaic faith. 'Aside from an interesting, though hostile and perhaps unreliable view of popular Jewish belief and practice in the eighteenth century,' this booklet mentions the Red Jews. Augusti reports that "The miracle-river [Sambation], from which the [holy] water is drawn, is said to be so agitated all week long that the waves toss stones around, and make crossing unsafe: only on the Sabbath does it flow calmly, as though it were celebrating the day of rest along with the Jewish people at the command of the Creator. Thus the Red

---

1. Geheimnisse der Ju'den von dem Wunder-Fluß Sambathjon, wie auch von denen rothen Juden, in einem Brief-Wechsel mit denen heutigen Ju'den, zur Erläuterung 2 Reg. 17.6 abgehandelt, und dem Druck überlassen von Friedrich Albrecht Augusti, Pastor zu Eschenberga im Fürstenthum Gotha (Erfurt, in Verlag der Jungnicolischen Erbin Buchhandlung, 1748). I consulted the only copy extant, that of the Stiftung Weimarer Klassik at Weimar. I owe a debt of thanks to Dr. Wolfgang Albrecht (Stiftung Weimarer Klassik) for his friendly assistance.

2. Many synagogues are said to have vials containing water and sand from the Sabbath; the water is agitated all week, but stands still on the Sabbath; Geheimnisse, 15-18.
Jews beyond the Sambation are hindered from meeting the rest of the Israelites scattered throughout the world; however, when great need makes it necessary, and all Jewry or ten chief rabbis give their permission, a number of stadlanim cross the river, and stay with the Red Jews for a time, in order to form a precise impression of their happiness, and to write down and make known to scattered Israel for its comfort all that they have seen and heard beyond the Sambation.

The Red Jews are, of course, the Ten Tribes, embellished as inhabitants of a paradisial realm, and seemingly the objects of a certain popular cult. The Messiah awaited by the Jews is to be found among the Red Jews, who keep him captive until he can go out and found a lasting peace:

"They explain and prove this answer' with the obedience

---

1. Intercessors or agents of the Jews, who are said to travel ceaselessly on behalf of Jewish interests, and to bring back the water of the Sabbath; Geheimnisse, Part I, para. 16, p. 15, note e.

The answer to the question why God has not yet liberated the Jews in exile; namely because divine justice is still punishing public evils.
of the Messiah, for he, a Son of David, is held captive amongst the Red Jews; all week long he is bound in iron chains [to one spot], but on the Sabbath he is tied by only a weak thread, which he does not break, nor does he cross the Sambation to liberate the captive Jews, in order not to break his obedience nor defile the Sabbath, until he can bring about a lasting peace and let all the sins of the Jewish people be avenged on his holy body..."

Augusti ascribes the term Red Jews to the Jews themselves, commenting:

"By 'Red Jews' they [the Jews] definitely understand the inhabitants [of the land] beyond the river Sambation, to whom they give this name, which is highly esteemed and glorious among them, both on account of the red and lively color of their face,\(^9\) and of the precious purple clothes, which they wear as the sign of a free people, in order to distinguish them from all other [Jews] living in miserable exile."\(^1\)

\(^{1}\) "Diese Antwort erlaßt und beweisen sie mit des Meßia' Gehorsam, denn es wurde derselbe, der ein Sohn Davids, unter denen rothen Ju'den in Gefangenschaft behalten; die gantze Woche wa're er mit eisern Ketten angebunden, am Sabbathe aber nur mit einem schwachen Faden befestigt, welchen er doch nicht zerreisse, nicht üBer den Sambathion gienge, und die gefangenen Ju'den erlö'se, damit er weder den Gehorsam, noch den Sabbath breche und entheilige, bis er um einen dauerhaften Frieden zu wege zu bringen, alle Laster des Ju'dischen Geschlechts an seinem heiligen Leibe austoben lassen..." Geheimnisse, Part I, para. 14, 13-14.

\(^9\) Cf. the translation of Victor's Judenbüchlein, the Opus aureum, in which the translator calls the Red Jews robustissimi.

\(^{1}\) The footnote after this paragraph continues: "The European and Asian Jews may not wear any red clothes because they are still in mourning over the the Temple and the city of Jerusalem. The color red is among the Jews a sign of freedom, and of the greatest joy. The royal children were distinguished from others by this color used for their clothes. The Red Jews, however, so they say, have experienced no galuth, no chorban, i.e., no exile and no desolation. These Jews wear the Augusti’s Jewish interlocutors have explanations ready for the odd term, he adds in a footnote: the color red in the most beautiful purple, no-one can forbid it them. Though permission is given nowadays by their chief rabbis to Jewish physicians and court Jews, both in Europe and in Asia, to wear red clothes, they must pay a yearly fee to the synagogue. As I have already noted above, some Jews of the Diaspora have been allowed to cross to this blessed land; they support the tale with the nonsensical fiction that from time to time, some red Jews had appeared in Europe and Asia, who had received permission from the princes of the House of David beyond the Sambation to break the Sabbath and cross the miraculous river, in order that their brethren might be strengthened and comforted.” The German original of this passage, including the text and note, reads as follows: “Durch die rothen Ju’den verstehen sie sicherlich die Einwohner jenseits des Flusses Sambathjon, welchen sie diesen unter ihnen so hoch geachteten und pra’chtigen Namen beylegen. sowol wegen der rothen lebhaften Farbe ihres Angesichts, als der kostlichen Purpur-Kleidung, womit sie als ein freyes Volck herum giengen, um sie von allen andern in elende lebenden zu unterscheiden. [note:] Die Europa’ischen, und Asiatischen Ju’den dur’reffen keine rother Kleider tragen, weil sie noch in trauer stehen, wegen des Tempels und der Stadt Jerusalem, die rothe Farbe ist bey denen Ju’den ein Zeichen der Freyheit, wie auch der gro’sten Freudigkeit. Die Ko’ niglichen Kinder haben dieses zum voraus gehabt, daß man sie an dieser Farbe von andern hat pflegen zu unterscheiden. Die rothen Ju’den hingegen sagen sie, haben kein Galuth, kein Chorban ausgestanden, d.i. keine Gefangenschaft, keine Verw’stung; diese Ju’den kleiden sich in den scho’nsten Purpur, ihnen darf es niemand wehren. Zwar wird auch noch heut zu Tage, denen Ju’dischen Aertzen und Hof-Juden, von denen Land-Rabbinen, in Europa und Asia, die Erlaubniß rothe Kleider zu tragen, gegeben, allein sie mussen davor ja’hrlich ein gewisses Geld der Synagoge zinsen. Wie ich bereits oben angefu’hret, daß einige Juden aus der Zerstreuung in dieses gebenedeyte Land über setzen dur’reffen; so bekra’fftigen sie alles mit dem nichtigen Gedichte; es wa’ren dann und wann einige rothe Ju’den in Europa und Asia zum Vorscheine gekommen, welche den Sabbath zu entheiligen, und über diesen Wunder-Fluß zu gehehn, von denen Obersten des hauses Davids jenseit des Sambathjons Erlaubniß erhalten, damit ihre bedra’ngte Brü’der gesta’rckt werden mo’chten.” Geheimnisse, Part II, para. 1, 27-29.
locution Red Jews is interpreted as the color of royalty, the purple of ancient and medieval sumptuary laws. The explanation is coherent and persuasive, and if there were even one ancient or medieval citation to support it, it would deserve serious attention. However, this study has reviewed strong evidence that the term Red Jews originated in the cultural-linguistic formation that produced the related term Rotwelsch in the thirteenth century, and is therefore a Christian term for a Christian fabrication. The Jewish rationale on which Augusti reports is a clever and logical attempt to make sense of a foreign term inherited from Christian Germany. As the medieval legend of the Red Jews lost its coherence in competition with the Biblical stories of the Ten Tribes and Gog and Magog, the term Red Jews lost its anchorage in antisemitic Christian apocalyptic, and became a free agent, which Jewish folklore adopted as a name for the Ten Tribes. Augusti does not comment on this explanation beyond calling the Red Jews and the Sambation a fable (Gedicht) and a superstition (Aberglaube).

In 1815, Christian August Vulpian, Goethe’s brother-in-

1. Augusti notes that the non-rabbinical Jewish sect of the Karaites, who lived mainly in eastern Europe and Asia Minor, and “who otherwise are not subject to superstition”, "fabulieren doch auch von dem Sambathjon und rothen Ju’den"; he refers his readers with the fine nonchalance born of well-known abbreviations to Christoph Wolf, “notitiam Kareor.”, p. 34, note a: Geheimnisse, 10.
law, published in his series Curiositaten der physisch-literarisch-artistisch-historischen Vor- und Mitwelt a brief condensation of Augusti’s booklet. Vulpia expands on a comment of Luther’s (cited by Augusti) in the Commentary on Ezekiel 38 and 39: "wie die landferer sagen" (as the vagabonds say). Luther seems to have been thinking of the exotic stories told by wandering (Christian) beggars. Vulpia understands the passage in terms of his own experience, noting:

"There is no doubt that the wandering vagabonds who say that they are Red Jews are frauds, but they used to find, especially in days gone by, among the Jews, particularly in Poland, many credulous souls who believed them. They told their fairy-tales and moved their audience to tears. That there was something in it for them, one can well imagine. These red guests comforted their brothers and gave them hope that their salvation would soon occur..."

It is not unreasonable to conclude that Vulpia knew of such vagabonds himself, because although Augusti mentions the 'fable' that some Red Jews had broken the Sabbath come out to

---

1. 10 vols. (Weimar 1811-1825); vol. IV (Weimar 1815).

4. The entry is entitled "Der Wunder-Fluß Sambathjon und die rothen Juden"; 527-535.

5. "Es ist kein Zweifel, daß die umherirrenden Landstreicher, welche sagen, wir sind rothe Juden, Beteru'ger sind, aber sie fanden, besonders ehemals, unter den Juden, vorzu'glich in Polen, viele gla'ubige Seelen. Sie erzäh'ltten ihre Ma'rtchen und ru'hrten die Zhuo'rer bis zu Thra'nen. Daß dabei fur sie etwas abfiel, kann man sich denken. Die rothen Ga'ste tro'sten ihre Bru'der und machen ihnen Hoffnung zur Erscheinung ihres Heils." "Der Wunder-Fluß Sambathjon und die rothen Juden", 534.
comfort their brethren," he does not provide the details to be found in Vulpius' article. The 'curiosity value' of this report is the main reason for its printing, as the title of the series suggests: the name was unclear, even if certain Jewish peddlers resorted to clothing themselves in the term as a means of attracting attention and presents, in the tradition of David Reuben.

In his novel Radetzky-Marsch, Joseph Roth (or rather, the narrator) depicts certain eastern Jews as red-headed and red-bearded, suggesting they might be descended from the "legendary people of the Chazars", who did in fact exist, and whose princes and nobles, at the very least, converted to Judaism, but who are never in any other context referred to as red-headed or as Red Jews. Isaac Bashevis Singer, in a short story called "To the Land of Israel", describes the plight of a poor old man who had always dreamed of going in search of the ten lost tribes beyond the Sambation. He emigrates from Warsaw to Israel, but comes home disillusioned: yet finally he is drawn back to the land of his ancestors. The narrator muses "Has he perhaps gone in search of the Red Jews on the other

---

5. Geheimnisse, Part II, para. 1, 28-29, note 2.
side of the river Sambation? You could expect anything from a man like Moshe Blecher."

A recent German translation of Mendele Mojcher Sforim's story "Die Reisen Benjamins des Dritten" contains numerous references to the Red Jews in the east."

The term 'Red Jews' survived into this century as a folkloric Jewish name for the Ten Tribes. In modern Jewish literature, the uprooted German phrase is pressed into service when an author wants to create an atmosphere of exotic eastern mystery. But while the modern Jewish use of the term to denote the Ten Tribes still shares the geographic co-ordinates of ancient and medieval legend -- themselves derived from Biblical sources --, it is entirely divorced from the intellectual and religious co-ordinates of the antisemitic apocalypticism that produced and articulated the legend of the Red Jews in medieval and early modern Germany.

". "To the Land of Israel", 37.

". This story is in Jiddische Erzählungen, trans. Leo Nadelmann (Zurich: 1985; Manesse-Bibliothek der Weltliteratur); passim.

". Some older eastern European Jews have vague recollections of stories about the "rote Jiddelech", which mirror the instances in the modern literature cited below. I am indebted to Winfried Frey (Frankfurt a/M) for this information.
Note: published verse texts have been reproduced with their original numbering; published and previously unpublished prose texts have been numbered in the left margin to facilitate quotation. The sixteenth-century pamphlets have been numbered according to the form in which they originally were printed, in order to facilitate bibliographical and textual comparison between editions. Numbers in square brackets within texts reproduce the page and line numbering of the manuscript or printing cited; numbers in square brackets in the left margin of translations indicate the corresponding line in the source text, according to my numbering.
1. Text of the Younger Titurel:

6124
Dri tageweide lenge man grōze berge vindet von disem mer só strenge. der berge ho'he die rōten Juden bindet,
daz si niht sint ûf erde progende varnde.
dazt von der berge ho'he. der regenbog ist vil ir ho'he sparnde.

6125 Gōg und Magōg hiezen zwō diet. nach den genennet sint dise berg, die sliezen kunnen wol die Juden, só bekennet.
snēl und wild ir meng ûbr al die wele.
krīsten unde heiden war ein niht gein in zu wider gelte.

6126
Ab den bergen rūnse gēt, wīt und grōz von steinen.
ein starker wagn erdūnse, ich wān, her von dem reine kūm ir einen.
kein var dar über wart noch nie besinnet
īn ditz mer von sande. durch diu lant gar ûne zuht iz rinnet.

6127
Die Juden iz besliuzet an einer siten umbe.
ein ander wazzer fliuzet vōn den bergen durch die wūsten krumbe
von wazzer lūter rein, gebirde wilde von gīmm und von gesteine: des līt dar inne wunder und unbilde.

---

The area here depicted is part of the legendary ingdom of Prester John. Printed in Albrecht von Scharfenberg, Der Jüngere Titurel, selected and edited by Werner Wolf
(Berne, 1978; =Altdeutsche Übungstexte, 14), strophes 6124-6127; also Der Jüngere Titurel, ed. Karl Hahn (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1842; =Bibliothek der gesammten deutschen National-Literatur, 24), v. 6057-6060. This immensely popular tale was printed in 1477 (Wolfenbüttel 275.8 Hist. 2°; Hain 6683); Wolf’s text depends as much on Hahn’s edition as it does on the 1477 text.
Prose translation:

[6124] Three days' march from this harsh sea [sea of sand and gravel], there are great mountains. The height of these mountains restrains the red Jews, so that they cannot swarm war-like and proud over the rest of the world. That is because the mountains are so high. The rainbow is much lower than these mountains are.

[6125] Gog and Magog are the names of two peoples after whom these mountains are called. The mountains easily contain the Jews described above. Swift and wild is their host, over all the earth. Christians and Jews [would be destroyed], were it not for one thing that prevails against them.

[6126] Down from the mountains flows a river, broad and filled with stones so big, that a great waggon could carry, I believe, hardly one of those in this "Rhine" (river). No crossing of this river to the sea of sand has ever been imagined. It flows through this land wildly and untamed.

[6127] It closes the Jews in on one side. Another river flows from the mountains and wends it way through the desert, with clear, clean water, and wild motion, full of gems and precious stones, of which the river contains many wondrous and unbelievable examples.
2. The Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg (end of 13th century):

Die usser welten helden gütt
Komend in ain ander land, 16168

Die waren Plotzen' genannt,
Daz waz dü rott Judischhaitt,
Von den man noch in landen saiDitt.
Die waren och vergifte wol.
16170

Von gesten sy vil schwern zol
Nomen, als man von in saiDitt.
16175

Daz land waz witt unde braitt
Tugende und beschaidenhaitt
Waz in allen tüerre.
16180

Gross und ungehürrre
Warend sy all gemeine
Und och so gar unraine, 16185

Wer ir ze rechtt nam war,
Des libe müst erschreken gar.
Man sach Ulixen den zagen
Aber sinen kummer clagen.
16190

Im gab der aber senden trosE
Der in dik hette erlost.
Es müste sin und solte wesen:
16195

Die miltten ritter usserlesen
Rustend aber ze stritte sich, Wen es in alles sicherlich
16200

Vor getett nie so not.
Uff den vil grimenklichen tod 16205

Wurden sy gevochten an Von mengen valschaften man 16210

Die den heren trügen hass,
Sy wüsten selber umb waz.

Hercules' erkantte
Daz ain unzalliche diet
Gegen dem kille geritt.

1. Der Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg, ed. Alfred Koppitz (Berlin, 1926; =Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, 29), 272-274.

3. On the basis of manuscript evidence, Koppitz suggests that this may be a corrupt form of Coltzen, itself a Germanization of Colchis. Trojanerkrieg, 272, note on line 16170.

4. Koppitz notes that not Hercules, but Ulysses is meant here. Trojanerkrieg, 273, note on line 16210.
Aber der forchtsame man
In den kill ze grund endran,
Dar inne er lag verborgen
Untz uff den zwölften morgen.
      Die werden ritter an der zitt
Müsten aber üben stritt
An den selben stunden

16215
Mit laden hel(le) hunden.
Sy trügend all gemaine an Von horne paldan fraisan,
Dar under stachelringe gantz,
Ir helm waren hartte glantz;

16220 Gefügett und geschmitt vin,
Ir schiltt on arge pin
Von kainer hande schwerte(n).
Strittens die faigen gertten,
Sy wolten do der Krichen gold
Haben und och des killes sold.

16225
Des müsten sich die fürsten wern.
Gort müsse üns die helden ernern!
Der lütte und des schalles toss
Ward so unmässenklichen gros

16230
Da von nach recht nieman
Daz wunde(r) volle sage(n) kan
Von diere creature.
Stark und ungehurre
So waz der kampflchen nott.

16235
Der vil grimekliche tod
Twang all da vil manigen man,
Dem ich doch der fraisse nit verbann.
Manig helm, schaittel unde bartt
Mitt swerten da gespalten ward.

16240
Ach Vennus, du kayserinne,
Ich main dich, werde Mine, Bis diinen diennern by Und tü sy aller sorgen fry!
Sy sprach: 'fründ Wolfran,

16245
Der dienner mine ich nit enlan.'
Aiax der fürste riche degen
Mitt mannes mütt usser wegen
Valtt ir mangen in sin blött
Sam tett der junge ritter gütt

16250
Aminall, des waffen brait
Manigen versertt und verschnaid.
Untz an des zweiften tages zitt
Wertte diere jomers stritt.
Manig starker Jude rott

16255
Lag da jemerlichen tod.
Da ward an den stunden

16260
Der balsame funden
Der noch ze manigen tütt
Dem menschen dike hochen mütt.

16265 Zweinzig tussend by den tagen
Ward der rotten diett erschlagen.
Och dü andren von dan
Hin an daz gebirge endran,
Die sitt her über mengiu jar

16270 Ain vil richer künge claur
Schläg und betwang daz land.
Alexander waz er genannt.

[And the Greeks, having won, move on to the next adventure.]
These fine warriors [the Greeks], the very best came into another land, called Plotzen. This was the land of red Jewry, which is still spoken of today. They were a poisonous lot indeed. From travellers they demanded a very heavy toll, their country stretched far and wide [line missing]. Virtue and modesty were perverted in all of them.
 In general they were huge and horrible, and so thoroughly foul and unnatural\(^5\) that anyone who looked at them closely experienced a physical reaction of fright. Ulysses the faint-hearted was seen to bewail his misery, but he who had often saved him, gave him estimable solace. It had to be and must come to pass: the noble knights, the best there were, armed themselves for battle; but it certainly had never before made them so anxious. Right unto the death they were attacked by many faithless men who hated them [their lordships], they themselves knew why.
 Hercules [i.e., Ulysses] saw that an innumerable horde was riding toward the ship. But, fearful man that he was, he fled to the bilge of the ship, and lay hidden there until the twelfth morning. The worthy knights had to defend themselves right away against these hateful hell-hounds.

\(^5\) See chapter III for a discussion of the meanings of "unrein/unrain".
They all wore terrifyingly solid body-plates of horn and underneath whole steel rings, their helmets were of shiny metal;
their shields were fitted together well and skilfully forged [unclear].
The damned ones [destined to die] desired battle, they wanted the gold of the Greeks and the ship for booty.
The princes must fight off the threat.
May God protect them for us!
The shouting and the yelling made by these creatures was so extremely loud that no-one can describe it properly.
Great and terrifying
was the horror of battle.
Grim death conquered many a man strong and fierce.
Many a helmet, skull, and beard were split with swords.
Ah, Venus, thou Empress,
I mean you, praiseworthy Dame Love, stand by your servants
and free them of all care!
Her answer: 'Friend Wolfram,'
I do not abandon my servants.'
Ajax the mighty prince,
in manly courage exalted above all others,
felled many a one in his blood,
just as the goodly young knight Aminall did, whose mighty sword injured and cut many, far and wide.
This horrifying battle lasted until the twelfth day.
Many a strong red Jew lay dead,
in wretched fashion.

The editor has suggested for the otherwise unknown word "paldan", "plate/blate": chest-plate, cuirass; Trojanerkrieg, 273, note to line 16222.

The author is strongly influenced by the work of Wolfram and by the Younger Titurel (thought in the middle ages to be the work of Wolfram); he goes so far as to intimate that he is himself Wolfram (Trojanerkrieg, XXII).
At that time
the balsam was found that still today gives men high spirits.'

Twenty thousand of the red people were killed in those days, and the others
fled from there into the mountains.
Many years later they were defeated by a very powerful and good king, who conquered that country.
That king was called Alexander.

1. Koppitz suggests an alternate reading: 'Da zeigte sich der barmherzig ['Erbarmesan erfunden' for "Der balsam funden"], der noch jetzt die Menschen in Nöten erfreut = Gott?' (And then he who still today helps people in dire straits showed himself to be merciful = God?); Trojanerkrieg, 274, note on lines 16261ff.
3. The Red Jews in Gottes Zukunft by Heinrich of Neustadt (c. 1300):9

Wie der Endecrist nach Gog und nach Magog und nach den roden Juden sendet.

5540 Als ez an der zit ist,
Die mere vernimpt Endecrist.
'Daz ist mir wider und unwert:
Ez endet kolbe und swert.
Mir ist die rede unmere

5545 Daz zwen alte beltenere
Sich su'ln setzen wider mich.
Ich bin geweltig und rich,
Caspi daz besloozzen lant
Daz ist gar in miner hant.

5550 Die roden Ju'den, daz volg Gog, Amazones und Magog,
Und waz der himel hat bedaht,
Daz mu'z dinen miner maht:
Das hat Got mir gegeben.

5555 Got, mit dem ich iemer leben.'
In den selben ziten
Heizt er gen und riten
Nach lu'ten verre in die lant
Die hie vor sint genant,

5560 Daz sie komen wol bereit
Mit harnesch an geleit.

[...]

5804 Wie der Endecrist stridet wider Helyas und Enoch.

WQ sint die lu'te gar bereit
Von den hie vor ist geseit, Daz volk daz da heizzet Gog,

---

9. in: Heinrichs von Neustadt 'Appolonius von Tyriand' nach der Gothaer Handschrift. 'Gottes Zukunft' und 'Visio Philiberti' nach der Heidelberger Handschrift, ed. S. Singer (Dublin/Zurich, 1967); =Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, 7), 331-352; 413-414. Excerpts of the Von Gottes Zukunft were published by J. Strobl (Vienna, 1875), and are the basis of this edition. See Singer's introduction for further details and literature (v-xiii).
Und daz ander Magog.

Zehn der geslehte sint
Und kamen von Japhetes kint:
Nie volk grüsenlicher wart.
In dem lande sint sie verspart:
Der starke Alexander

Dreip sie mit einander Durch die berge Caspie.
Sie enmohten sieder niemer me
Her uz zu den lu’ten komen:
Daz understet nach irm fromen

Die ku’niginne Amazonum
Riche in hohem ru’m:
Daz heizt in der megde lant.
Der Endecrist hat dar gesant:
Dez werdent sie alle gemeit

Und zu diinne im bereit.
Ir ist worden als vil
Daz ir zal ist ane zil.
Man sperret uf die strazzen:
Sie werdent uz gelazen

Und varent also da hin.
Gein Jherusalem is ir sin:
Ir mu’ft ist daz sie wellen
Beide stozzen und vellen Gemeinlich alle cristenheit.

Ir her ist groz und breit.
So sie komen vor die stat
An daz dal zu Josephat,
So vert auch dort von dem mer
Helyas do mit Cristes her.

Die bose diet wirt alle erslagen
Von Cristi kempfen bi den tagen,
Ich mein daz ungestalte volk Gog
Und ir geslehte Magog,

Zu Josephat in dem tal:
Nieman wißen mag ir zal.
Die Got zu kempfen erkos,
Die werdent doch sigelos.
Helyas und die cristen schar Werdent do erslagen gar,
Enoch bliibt auch da dot:

Die Jü’den kerent sich zu Got,
Sie gestent auch Cristes gebot.
Beide Jü’den und heiden Mag nieman gescheiden.
Der heilige tauf nimpt über hant
Und Cristes è über alle lant.
Ez wirt ein glaube gantz
In Cristes orden ane schrantz.
Translation:

[This passage belongs to a long disquisition on the last things. Typical details concerning the Antichrist and his birth at Babylon of the tribe of Dan (5022-5051), his reception by the Jews at Jerusalem (5128-5133), the Holy Roman Emperor deposing his crown on the Mount of Olives (5440), the conversion of the Jews (5450-5455) and the Jews and heathens (5526-5528) are thrown together, betraying the multiplicity of not necessarily concordant sources from which this compilation is drawn. After these events, Enoch and Elijah return to oppose the Antichrist, who musters his forces.]

THE ANTICHRIST SENDS FOR GOG AND MAGOG, AND FOR THE RED JEWS.

[5540] When the time was ripe, Antichrist heard the tale [that Elijah and Enoch had come to oppose him].
'I find this abhorrent and sickening: only clubs and swords will put an end to it. I do not care about the news that two old beggars are to oppose me. I am powerful and mighty, and Caspia, the enclosed country, is entirely in my hands.

[5545] The Red Jews, the people of Gog, the Amazons and Magog, and whoever else Heaven may have placed there must serve my power: God has granted me this,

[5550] God, with whom I will live forever.' At the same time he ordered that [messengers] go and ride to the peoples named above in far-off lands, [5555] that they should come well prepared, with their armour on.

[There follows the dispute between Enoch and Elijah and the Antichrist, who then performs wonders, martyrs those who do not worship him, dies and rises again on the third day, and finally joins battle with Enoch and Elijah:]

HOW THE ANTICHRIST FIGHTS ENOCH AND ELIJAH.
Now the people, who were mentioned above, are all ready, the people that is called Gog, and the other called Magog.

They are ten tribes and are the descendants of Japhet: never was there a people more terrifying. They are locked up in that country: the mighty Alexander drove them altogether through the Caspian Mountains. Since then they have not been able to come out to the people [the rest of the world]: For her own sake, The Queen of the Amazons, of great and glorious fame, prevents it. [Amazon] means in the land of the maidens. The Antichrist has sent his messengers there [to 'Caspia'], and they [the inhabitants] all rejoiced and were ready to serve him. They have become so numerous that their numbers are without end. The passes are opened up: they are let out and they start their march: they are headed for Jerusalem: they intend to attack and cut down all of Christendom.

Their armies are great and widespread. When they come before the City to the valley of Josaphat, at the same time Elijah comes from the sea with Christ's army. [...]

The evil people are all killed at that time by Christ's representatives, I mean the foul people of Gog and their kindred Magog, in the vale of Josephat; no-one can know how many they are. [Yet] those whom God chose as his fighters were not victorious. Elijah and the Christian host are entirely destroyed there, and Enoch falls there too.

The followers of the Antichrist triumph, but are soon destroyed when the archangel Michael kills their leader and they are dragged off to Hell. The Jews, however, are spared and convert:

The Jews convert to God, and acknowledge Christ's commandments. No-one can distinguish either Jews or heathens from Christians. Holy baptism triumphs and the Christian faith spreads over all lands.

There is but one faith, whole and undivided, without splits in Christ's ranks. [A purified and sinless humanity is allowed forty-five days to confess their past sins and set their souls in order: then the Last Judgement begins.]
4. The middle High German version of the Passau Anonymus (c. 1330):¹⁰

1 X: De Gog et Magog

[U]on der unzallichen diet, die Gog vnd Maggog an der hailigen geschrift seind genant, der seind zwelf geschlächte, die haut weilent der qwaltig kung Alexander mit des allmechtigen gottes kraft hinder gar grossem "nd aislichem gepirge verschlossen, das sy nit herauß mügend komen vntz ze des anticristus zeiten. So verhenget in got, das sy auß varend uf die cristenhait vnd wellend die verderben vnd tünd den cristen laid vnd angst, als die hailig geschrift ietzu betüttet haut. Ze den selben zeiten so ist römischn reich zu Franckreich komen vnd des kïnigreiches pflikt danne ain sälig rain kïnig, der gott mit vorchten vor augen haut. Der besamnet sich denne mit mänigen güten cristen, die mit sambt im ir leben durch die liebe vnsers herren uff die waug setzend vnd bestand die vngetauften diet mit stritt, vnd ob der kristen vil verderbend, doch gesigend sy den selben juden an, die haissend auch die r‘ten Juden, vnd schlachend sy so gar ze tode, daz ir ainer nit belibet. Sehend, also ist denne daz für von hymel, das ist gottes zorn, uff si komen vnd haut sy verschwendet an dem libe vnd dar zu mit sambt der sel inn den prinnenden see geworfen, als auch die hailig geschrift vor haut kintent. Wa von aber die roten juden ze diser zeit nit auß mügent komen, das ist gut ze wissen. Es ist das selb land an ainem tail mit so hohem vnd so aislichem gepirge vnd stain geschürre vmb vangen, das ioch kain vogel darüber geflugen mag. So ist an dem andern tail so grosse vnd so dicke vinsternüst vmb das selb land, das man die selben vinsternüß mit dehainem liechtem durch brechen mag. Da uon mag man dar durch nit komen. So ist an dem dritten tail daz selb land mit einem starken wasser versperrt. Das ist so schnell, daz ze allern zeit grosß stain dar inne walgend vnd joch von grund auf vnd nider vallend, das dehain mensch dar über mag, wann ains tages inn dem jare so geligend die stain stille. Des selben tages vert ettwenne ain cristen in das selb land seines kauffes willen. Der müß auch daz gantz jar dar inne beliben. Sechend, dis sache irret das volck mit gottes gewalt, daz sy nit auß mügent, vntz das sin gott

by des anticristen zeiten verhengent wirt. Nun wenend die duden vnd ettlich jüdisch kristen, das selb volk syend hailig lůt vnd sechend gern, wennen sy komen, wann si kerend zehant in ir schar. Die selben roten juden bringent mit in ze stritt Mesophos, die selben nennet Josephus Cappadocos vnd pringend die krestenreich Tybal vnd die übeln Spanyol vnd die von Persia vnd die von Libia vnd die von Morenland vnd die von Dogorma vnd von Gomorren, die uon Dascia vnd von Sardeinn vnd mit sambt den uon Karthago vnd noch mänig ungetäffte diet, als der engel ze sanct Johannes sprach, das ir zal sy als der grieß des meres.
O we danne der zeit! Sehend, so nahet das zil, da sant Paulus vnd ander hailig geschrift von gekundet haut. Der anticrist der kumpt nit, vntz das die missehellung kumpt, das ist, das alle reich römischn kaysertûm vngehorsam werdent vnd alle pfaffen des bapstes gebott nit achtend.
Sehend, wer diser sache recht war nimpt, so haut es sich bey vnsern zeiten laider vast an gehaben vnd nachet auch num vaste gegen der welte ende, als sanct Paulus gesprochen haut: 'Wir syen die, an die der welte ende comen ist'. [I. Cor. 10,11]
Translation:

[1] Gog and Magog

As concerns the countless peoples, who are called Gog and Magog in Holy Scripture, they are twelve [12] tribes, whom the mighty king Alexander long ago enclosed with the help of almighty God behind great and horrible mountains, so that they cannot come forth until the time of the Antichrist. Then God will allow them to march against Christendom, which they want to destroy. They will cause the Christians great suffering and terror, as Holy Scripture says. At the same time the Holy Roman Empire will devolve on France and the kingdom will be cared for by a holy and good king who fears God. He will join with many good Christians, who with him are ready to put their life at risk for the love of our Lord. They will vanquish the unbaptized peoples in battle, and although many of the Christians will die, they will conquer these Jews, who are also called the Red Jews, and smash them so thoroughly that not one of them is left alive. See, fire has therefore fallen on them from heaven, that is, God's wrath, and has destroyed their bodies and thrown their souls into the fiery lake, as Holy Scripture has foretold. The reason why the Red Jews cannot escape right now is good to know. Their country is enclosed on one side with such high and terrible mountains and such an array of stones that even a bird cannot fly over them. On another side there is a darkness so thick and so far that surrounds this land that no light can penetrate it. For this reason one cannot get through it. On the third side this land is cut off by a great river. It flows so fast, that at all times great boulders roll along it and even bounce from the riverbed to the surface, such that no human being can cross it, except on one day in the year, when the stones are at rest. On this day sometimes a Christian goes into this land to trade. He must stay there the entire following year. Take note, God's might hinders the people from breaking out, until God allows them to do so at the time of the Antichrist. The Jews and many many Judaizing Christians imagine that this people is holy: they would be glad if they were to come, and would join their ranks immediately. These same Red Jews bring with them as battle-companions the Mesophos [Meshech?], whom Josephus calls Cappadocians, and they bring the Christian kingdom of Tybal [Tubal?]
and the evil Spaniards and those from Persia and from Lybia and from the land of the Moors and from Dogorma and Gomorrah, from Dacia and from Sardinia as well as those of Carthage and many other unbaptized peoples, as the angel said to Saint John, "their number is as the sand of the sea." [Rev. 20,8]

[50] [The king of France, i.e., the Friedenskaiser, vanquishes them and reigns over a time of great peace and abundance, until he decides to set his crown down on the Mount of Olives, after which will begin a time of great misery and persecutions]

O alas and alack for our times! See, now the goal draws near, of which Saint Paul and other Holy Scriptures warned. The Antichrist will not come until the

[55] Tribulation, that is, when all kingdoms become disobedient to the Holy Roman Empire and all clerics ignore the orders of the pope. As he who understand these matters correctly will see, this has already started to happen in our own time, and the end of the world is coming quickly. As Saint Paul

[60] said: ‘we are those, upon whom the ends of the world have come.’ [I Cor. 10,11]
5. The middle High German Buch der Maccabäer by Ludger of Braunschweig (before 1335): ¹

789 Alexander in der wile
vur mit sines volkes zile zu bergen hiezen Caspios, mit im manic man unde ros.
In dem gebirge da waren
der juden zen groze scharen 795 gevangen unde eigen gar, sie torsten niht daruz vorwar, Diz waren die zen geslehte,
die Israelin vil rehte,
ouch nennet man sie sus dari 800 die roten Juden. Daz sint die, mit den in der letzten zit Goc
kumet hervur unde Magoc.
Durch waz disse in getwangen
nu hie sus waren gevangen, 805 und wie man sie noch baz besloz, ein teil entdecken wir des bloz, wand wir wisen dort vornen an,
da vint man ez geschriben stan
in der kunge buchen. Ez quam 810 darnach und daz Jerobeam machte zwei kelbere guldin, daz solden ire gote sin;
sie anbetten sie in der zit, des plagte sie got alsus sit 815 unde gab sie in die hende der heiden in diz ellende.
Alsus was bliben die rote
da von der kunge gebote, die sie dar getriben haten; 820 des waren sie in den staten,
daz sie von gebotes wegen
uz niht torsten wanderns pflegen.
Sus was Alexander nu hie vor dem gebirge nahen bi.
825 Die gevangen dort inne wurden des kunges da inne, zu im ir boten sie sanden vieliche wort an en wanden
von der zen geslehte scharen, 830 die in dem gebirge waren;

¹ Das Buch der Maccabäer in mittledeutscher Bearbeitung, ed. Karl Helm (Tübingen, 1904; =BLVS, 233).
an en was alsus ir bete, daz er sie gelazen hete vri wandern widir zu lande uz disme gebotes bande.

835 Allexander vragende wart, warumme sie also verspart
weren in den bergen so hart.
Des wart antwurte mit der vart:
"Unserre vetre was die schult;

840 hie bevor sie mit ungedult karten von dem waren gote, dem alle dinc zu gebote
sten unde die geschaffen hat.
Daz schuf Jerobeamis rat,

845 zwei kelbere liez er machen quldin gut, und in den sachen betten sie die kelbere an,
zu abgoten sie vurbaz han.
Durch daz hat uns gepfloget got und gestozen in disse not;
sider immer me da here sin wir von gebote swere hie von den kungen gebunden also du uns nu hast vunden.

850 Auch haben gotes propheten vor gekundet allen deten unde han gesprochen vurwar, daz unser zen geslehte schar
nimmer keinez zukumen mac

855 unz hin vor den jungesten tac."

860 Allexander antwurte gab, zu den boten iach er hinab:
"Sint daz der Israhelen got uch zu gebraht hat disen spot, als er durch der propheten munt hat von uch hie gemacht kunt, wand er durch uwere bosheit diz allez uch hat angeleit und alle mine vorvaren

865 mit gebote herte waren, uch twungen unde her triben (von en sit ir hie gebliben), icch wil niht widertun die tat,
sicch ez ist willen unde rat

870 des grozen gotes, der da hat in siner hant swaz vrucht entfatt.
Ich bestete daz vubaz me,
swaz sie begunnen haben e, unde wil nach irme willen
uch noch hertelicher stillen, in den bergen uch vermachen, so daz ir mit keinen Sachen nimmer me hervor gekumet, uz noch in; daz si verdrumet,
uf daz gotes wille volge
unde immer me ewic ste."

Do begunde Allexander mit in einer und der ander arbeiten mit alle der maht, die im quam unde hate braht,
daz er vermuren zu pflege
wolde gar alle die wege, die in daz gebirge giengen.
Daz werce sie hartc anviengen, mit grozen steinen unvugen sie sere zusamne trugen.
Do die arbeit sus mit ile was geschent etzliche wilc, daz sach Allexandri wisheit, wie die ubergroze arbeit was unmenschlich zu volbrengen;
des wart er sich an got spengen unde sprach sin gebete so:
"Du got, der uber al bist ho,
wand din wilhe diz selbe ist,
daz man verveste hie mit list
diz volc in disen gebergen durch ir ubeltat mit ergen, unde want wir mit menschencraft
ez niht mugen machen slozhaft,
so lege din gewalt zu, desluz mit dem gebirge nu
diz volc, so daz ez nimmer me heruz kume, daz ist min vle."

Got irhorte sin gebete, daz gebirge sich zu tete
unde sloz sich zusamne gar, daz nieman uz noch in vurwar
mac kumen biz an iene zit, so na der letzte tac gelit.
Denne kumen die geslehte
uz den bergen durch gevehte, wand von ir vehten und ir strit gar vil der werlde tot gelit.

Uf disse sach sprichet sus
der meister genant Josephus:
"Sint daz got dise groze dinc hat getan hie durch den kuninc, der ungeloubic was voran

unde ein heidenischer man, noch gar vil me so tete er durch eines geloubigen ger."
Ouch sprich ich nu daz mine zu ich armer genant mit unru:

Welde der geloubige gar gote getruwen ane var,
so mohten durch sin gebeten die berge zusamne trcten unde sich rucken von der stat, swa hin daz er zie gerne hat;

wand sente Marcus daz wiste von gote evangeliste, der da beschribet wol also in sime evangelio;

daz ez ware muge gesin,
daz wart an disme heiden schin, Wir sullen her wider wandern
und grifen an Allexandern.
At this time Alexander marched with the columns of his army to the mountains called Caspian, with him many men and horses. In these mountains were the ten great hordes of the Jews captive and enslaved, they could not come out. They were the ten tribes, the true Israelites. They are also called the red Jews. They are those with whom Gog and Magog will break out in the last days. Why they were enclosed and thus imprisoned, and how they were even better enclosed we can only tell in part here, and we note at the beginning that one can find it written in the book of Kings. It happened thereafter that Jeroboam made two golden calves, which were to be their gods. They worshipped them at that time. And God has punished them for it ever since, and given them over into the hands of the heathens in this exile. Therefore the redness [the shame] of the king’s orders (which they had followed) remained, and for that reason they were in the situation that they could not, by divine decree, leave and go elsewhere. Now Alexander was close by to the mountains. The prisoners therein learned of the king’s presence and sent emissaries to him. They addressed him with pleading words, those from the hordes of the ten tribes, who were in the mountains. They begged him to let them out to wander freely back to their land, out from the bonds of their commanded captivity. Alexander asked why they were thus locked up in the harsh mountains.
They answered immediately:
"The sin was our forefathers'; [840] long ago they were so impatient as to turn away from the true God, who rules over all things
and who created them.
It was Jeroboam's decision; [845] he had two calves made of pure gold, and for that reason they worshipped the calves, and had them as idols.
That is why God has punished us [850] and thrown us into this misery.
Since then, and increasingly so, we have been held captive here under the gravest orders
by the kings,
until now you have found us.
[855] Also, God's prophets have announced to all peoples, and have spoken truly,
that the hordes of our ten tribes cannot come out [860] until just before the Last Judgement." Alexander answered, saying haughtily to their messengers
"Since the God of Israel has marked you with this shameful captivity, [865] as he announced concerning you through the prophets' mouths, and he did all this to you on account of your wickedness, and all my forefathers [870] were harsh with their commandments, pressing you hard and driving you hither (they were the ones who put you here),
I do not wish to undo these deeds,
as they are the will and decision [875] of the great God who has in his control every living thing that bears fruit.
Rather, I will shore up what they began so long ago,
and will suppress you even more harshly, [880] in accordance with their will.
I will seal you up in the mountains,
so that you can
by no means whatsoever come forth, neither out nor in; let that [them?] be destroyed.
so that God's will is done and stands for ever more."
Then Alexander began,
and with him the rest,
to work with all their might,
those who had come with him and those he brought,
in order to wall up all the passages and paths that went into the mountains.
They worked strenuously at this task;
they piled up many great boulders.
Once the work had been going on at this fast pace
for quite some time, Alexander realized that it was too much work for mere humans to accomplish.
He turned to God
and said his prayer thus:
"O God, who are high above all else,
if this be your will,
that these people be enclosed here carefully in these mountains
for their dreadful sins,
since we cannot close them up with our human powers, apply your might,
close this people up in the mountains,
so that they can never again come out, this is my plea."
God heard his prayer, and the mountains closed up and shut themselves completely, such that no-one might go in or out until the time when the Last Judgement approaches.
Then the tribes will fight their way out of the mountains;
their fighting and attacks will leave much of the world dead.
Concerning this matter
the master called Josephus says:
"Given that God did this great deed through a king who had been an unbeliever and a heathen,
he will do even greater things
if a believer asks in prayer."
And I will add my piece to this,
I, a poor man called Unruh:
If the believer were to trust entirely in God without any reservations whatsoever, his prayers could move mountains together, and move them from their places, to wherever he wanted them; just as Saint Mark, God's evangelist knew, and as he states so well in his gospel [Mark 16,16]; that this is true, is proved by the example of this heathen. Now we ought to move on, and turn our attention back to Alexander.
6. Konrad Steckels deutsche Übersetzung der Reise nach China des Odorico de Pordenone:\(^2\)

a) Latin original (1320s or 1330s):

De peponibus in quibus nascuntur bestiole facte ad modum unius agni CAP. XXXI.

Aliud insuper valde mirabile dici potest, quod tamen non vidi sed audivi a personis de fide dignis. Nam dicitur quod Cadelis est unum magnum regnum, in quo sunt montes qui montes Capei\(^3\) nominantur. Unde ut dicitur in eis nascuntur pepones valde magni, qui quando sunt maturi ipsi aperiuntur et intus inventur una bestiola, ad modum unius agni parvi. Unde ipsi illos pepones habent et illas carniculas que sunt ibi. Et quamquam istud forte incredibile videatur, tamen ista possunt esse vera, sicut verum est quod in Ibernia sunt arbores facientes aves.

De provincia Casairon magni Canis que est ita habitat qua quando per portam unius civitatis exitur, porta alterius civitatis videtur. CAP. XXXII

De isto Catayo recedens et veniens versus ponentem seu occidentem, L dietis transeundo per multas civitates et terras veni versus terram Prestiçane, de quo non est centesima pars eius quod quasi pro certo dicitur de ipso. Eius civitas principalis Cosan vocatur, que tamen ipsa Vincencia melior civitas dicetur quam illa civitas Cosan, sua civitas principalis; multas alias civitates sub se habet. Sed semper pro pacto accipit in uxorem filiam magni Canis.

\(^2\) Ed. Gilbert Strasmann (Berlin, 1968; =Texte des späten Mittelalters und der frühen Neuzeit, 20); Latin: 118; German: 119.

\(^3\) Mss. AV have "capesei"; Y has "Caspei" and Hak. has "Kapsei".
Translation:

[1] On the Melons in which are generated little animals made in the semblance of a lamb. Chapter XXXI.
I can add yet another highly wondrous thing, which I myself however did not see, but heard from trustworthy persons. Cadelis is said to be a large kingdom, in which the Ca(s)pian Mountains are located. As it is said, great melons grow there. When they are ripe, they open and a little animal is found inside, something like a small lamb. They have these melons and other little meats therein. And although this seems quite incredible, yet it may well be true, just as it is true that there are in Ireland (Hibernia) trees that bring forth birds.

Concerning the province of Casairon of the Great Khan, which is so densely settled that when one goes out by the gate of one city, one can see already see the gate of the next city. Chapter XXXII.

Leaving Cathay and travelling westward, after a journey of fifty days through many cities and lands, I came towards the country of Prester John, who has not one percent of all that is said with so much certainty to belong to him.

[20] His main city is called Cosan, but the city of Vicenza would be called a better city than that city of Cosan, his main city; he has many other cities in his control. But he always accepts as a pledge (of allegiance) a daughter of the Great Khan. [...]

b) Middle High German translation (1359):

1 Ich han auch gehört daselbß, aber jch han sein selber nicht gesehn, daz da selbn pey den landn jn einem gróssn chvnigreich, da die perg da sein, die da haizznt Montez Caspy, da die Roten Judn jn schulln beslossn sein -- in dem selbn chvnigreich, da waksnt jnn frúcht, die man latein <haisset> peponez, vnd sind alß vnser erdópphel oder pháedenn oder melonez. Si sind aber [ ] grósser dann ein grozz kúrbis. Vnd wenn si zeitig sind, daz man si auff tüet, so vindt man ein tyrlein darjnn, wol alß ein chlainez lémpel. Vnd wie ez vnglawbliich dunkcht, ez ist doch wol műglich, wann man ign mann wol gewissn ist vnd auch mír, daz in Jbernia, in dem landt pey dem Schottnlantt, eczleich pawn sind, da vogel auff wachsnt, vnd die sind desselbn pawnß recht frucht, vnd wenn si nider vallent, chómént si auch auff daz wasser, so lebent si zehant vnd vliessnt, vallent si aber auff daz land, so beleibnt si tod.

20 Saphon

Von dem land fuer jch wol zwainczik tagwaid durich vil stett vnd gegent zwischn dez orientz gleicht vnd dez occidentz gen mittentag vnd chóm in ein ch’nigreich, <deß hawptstatt haisset> Casan. Der chvnikch daselbß hat vil stett vnder jm vnd siczt mit semlichn geding genn dem grossn hunt, daz er allczeit dez gróssn húntz tochter nimpt ze einer ku’nigin.
There I also heard, though I myself did not see it, that in that same area, in a great kingdom, where those mountains are, that are called the Caspian Mountains, in which the Red Jews are said to be enclosed -- in that same kingdom grows the fruit which is called "pepones" in Latin, and are like our turnips or cucumber or melons. They are, however, larger than a big squash. And when they are ripe enough to be opened, one finds a little animal in them, just like a little lamb. And although it seems unbelievable, it is entirely possible, as is well known to many and to me, that in Hibernia, in the country near Scotland, there are many trees in which birds grow, and they are the actual fruit of these trees, and when they fall, if they land in water, they come to life immediately and swim (float), but if they fall on land, they remain dead.

From this land I traveled a good twenty days through many cities and regions between the abutting eastern areas and the southwest, and came to a kingdom the capital of which is called Casan. The king there has many cities in his power and has such treaty commitments to the Great Dog that he always takes the daughter of the Great Dog as his queen.
32. Antichrist

Entekerst schal geboren werden to Babilonien van yodescher art van eynes patriarchen slechte, de het Dan, unde wert geboren van unechte unde wert besneden also eyn yode, unde eue wert erst gegeuen eyn hillich engel. also eneme anderen menschen. Darna, wan he so vormeten wert, dat he sprekt, he sij Christus, godes son, so vortiget syner de engel, unde de duvel vnderwynnet sijk syner. He wert weldich. Alle de yoden volgen eue. De roden yoden, de besloten sin, de komet ut unde volgen eue. Se bouwen den tempel to Iherusalem wedder unde beden en an also eynen god unde spreken, he sij Christus, unde unse here Ihesus Christus dat hebbe Entekerst gewesen.

Translation:

[1] 32. Antichrist

The Antichrist shall be born in Babylon of the Jewish people, from the lineage of a patriarch, called Dan, and shall be born out of wedlock and circumcised like a Jew, and he will at first receive a holy angel [protective angel], just like any other human being does. Afterwards, when he is so arrogant that he says he is Christ, God’s son, the angel will disown him and the Devil will appropriate him. He shall become powerful. All the Jews shall follow him. The Red Jews, who are locked up, come out and follow him. They will rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem and worship him as a god and say, he is Christ, and our Lord Jesus Christ was the Antichrist.

---

16. The word weldich compares to modern Dutch geweldig, forceful, violent.
8. The Gesta Romanorum Das ist der Roemer Tat (14th/15th century): 17

Von dem Alexander in dem v. capitel.

Alexander der grozz ku'nich von Chriechen der regnocht u'ber ellew' Asischew lant zuo Orient und behabt die herschaft der werlt als man liset in der Chriechischen choronik und die puocher sagent Machabex und der vacht mit den roten Juden die da haizzent daz zehent geslacht die vor mangen Jarn der ku'nich Salmanasar gefangen het Vnd se'w' satzt zuo dem gebirg caspij nach vj Jarn geschach daz der vorgenant ku'nich chom fu'r die stat da dez geslechten der Juden inne wonten vnd vacht wider die stat vnd wold sy gewynnen. [...] Mit dem synne der weisen tet alexander und gewan die stat. Nu waz dez po'sen volks noch so vil daz alexander besorgt ir pozzhait und kniet nider wie er doch eyn haiden war und pat got von himel daz er daz po'z volk ungtrewez fieng mit seinem gewalt. daz geschach also daz in get erhört. Do giengen die perig in dem lande ze samen und umb gaben die roten Juden und ward ein ungengi vart von den pergen von der geschicht spricht ein maister haizzet Josaphus der Juden schreiber oder prophet. Daz got erhört hat eynen ungelaubhaftigen menschen. und eynn heiden als alexander waz. Waz tuot er dann zuo ent der werlt. Wann daz selb volk chumt mit irem antichrist auz und marternt die laut so tuot er grös'sers zaichen durch seinen willen. Also tempfet got daz hochfertig volkh mit alexandro dem ku'nig und mit dem rat der weisen maister. Ez ist pillaih daz eyn wider spaniges volkh und hochfertigez u'ber hert wor'd. und u'berweist mit eynem andern. Dar umb liezz got den ku'nich alexander so gewaltig werden daz die po'sen wurden gestraft mit im. als der weis man sprach in dem puoch Job. Qui regnare tacite ypocrisam propter peccata populorum. Got verhengt daz ein wü'treich reichsent und tuot daz durch der laut su'ndt daz si werden gestraft und gepessert.

---

17. Ed. Adalbert Keller (Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1841; =Bibliothek der gesammten deutschen National-Literatur, 22), 3-10.
Concerning Alexander in the fifth chapter. Alexander the Great, king of the Greeks, reigned over all Asian lands in the Orient and had mastery of the whole world, as we read in the Greek chronicle and in the books called 'The Maccabees' and he fought with the Red Jews who are called the ten tribes whom king Salmanasar took captive many years ago, and placed them in the Caspian Mountains. After six years it came to pass that the aforementioned king came before the city where the tribes of the Jews lived and besieged the city and desired to take it. Alexander followed the advice of the wise men and conquered the city. Now there were still so many of the wicked people that Alexander was concerned about their wickedness and kneeled down, even though he was a pagan, and begged God in heaven to take the wicked faithless people into his power. This happened in such a way that they [incomprehensible]. Then the mountains in that land came together and surrounded the Red Jews and the path out of the mountains became impassable. A master called Josephus, the scribe or prophet of the Jews, says concerning this story: God heard an unbeliever and a heathen such as Alexander. What then will he do at the end of the world, when this same people breaks out with their Antichrist and martyrs the people [Christians], he will do great signs. Thus God humbled this arrogant people by means of Alexander the king and the advice of the wise men. It is fitting that a rebellious and arrogant people be oppressed and be subjected to another. For this reason, God allowed king Alexander to become so powerful that the wicked were punished by him, as the wise man says in the book of Job: Qui regnare facit hypocricam propter peccata populorum. God lets a tyrant rule on account of the people's sins, and does this so that they may be punished and corrected.
Man prant die juden in allen landen von des grözen tödes wegen.

Anno domini MCCCxljx dö gieng der gröz mortlich liumd Üz von den juden, daz si alliu wazzer, diu man vergiften mocht, ez wärint [Fol. 31 a.] brunnen oder bäch, vergift hättint. Diu selbe gift des érsten von den rotten juden kam, und was vermérret, als man sait, mit unken, und was als unrain, swelichez mensche mit der gift verséret ward, daz lepte nit lenger denne an den dritten tag, und kam darzuoz daz kain priester zuo den siechen liuten gaun wolte, und flöch menniglich von den siechen, wann daz man in etlichen stetten knecht kostlich gewinnen muost, die die liut zuo kilchen trüegent, só si érst gesturben, und ze hand begrüebent. Diser siechttag was als giftig, swenne ain gesund mensche dem siechen in die nzchi kam, daz ez autem oder tunst von dem siechen angieng, oder sin gewand beroorte, daz muoste sterben. Und gieng von ain an daz ander, alsó daz ganze dörfer, gazzen und huizer oede stuondent, und was der groest töd und daz ungehörtést sterben in allen landen, daz man von anvang der welt ëf ain zit allenthalben je vernam. Und huob zuo dem érsten an ennet dem mer, dar nach kam ez in weischiu land, dar nach in alliu tiutschen land. Also würdent die juden in allen landen verbrant, bi nach alle juden, die gewächsent wären; vil kind würdent getcuipt und behalten. Also würdent die juden verderpt von ir gröze ungehörtten mordes wegen, und nit mit unredlicher sache. Des selben járs würdent alle juden im Elsauz verbrant im Jenner, und ze Zürich umbe Sant Mathis tag ooch des selben járs, als dà vor staut.

9. Gerhard Sprenger’s mid-fifteenth-century compilation of fourteenth-century Zürich Jahrbücher:\textsuperscript{18}

\textsuperscript{18} Die beiden ältesten deutschen Jahrbücher der Stadt Zürich, ed. Ludwig Ettmüller (Zürich, 1844; =Mittheilungen der Antiquarischen Gesellschaft in Zürich, II), 15-96. The first part of the first Jahrbuch was written by an anonymous who breaks off his narrative with the year 1336. It is continued to the year 1446 by the compiler Gerhard Sprenger of Constance, who was a canon at Embrach at the time of the Council of Constance (1414-1418). This entry, for the year 1349, is found on pages 71 and 72. The manuscripts used by Ettmüller, from the Bürgerbibliothek at Zurich, date from the fifteenth century and are written on paper.
Translation:

[1] The Jews were burnt in all countries on account of the Great Death
In the year of our Lord 1349 the great murderous rumour went out concerning the Jews that they had poisoned all the waters that could be poisoned, whether springs or streams. This same poison first came from the red Jews, and it was strengthened, they say, with serpents [their venom], and was so foul and devilish, that any person touched by this poison could live no longer than three days. In addition, no priest wanted to go to the sick people, and many fled from the sick, such that in many cities it was very expensive to hire serving-men who would carry people to the church yard as soon as they had died and bury them right away. This sickness was so poisonous that when a healthy person came close enough to a sick one to be touched by the breath or miasma of that sick person, or touched his garment, he was sure to die. And it went from one [person] to the next, in such a way that entire villages, streets and houses stood empty and waste, and it was the greatest death and the most unheard-of dying in all countries that was ever reported from the beginning of the world until the present day. And it started out at the end of the sea [the Mediterranean?], then it came to the Romance countries, and then to all the German lands. Thus, the Jews were burnt in all countries, nearly all the adult Jews; many children were baptized and adopted. Therefore the Jews were smashed because of the great murder they had committed, and not without just cause. In the same year all the Jews of Alsace were burnt, in January, and at Zurich around St. Matthew’s Day in the same year as noted above.

---

19. verméren can be understood in the sense of meren, which in the early modern High German dialects meant abstimmen, to adjust, to suit: Alfred Götze, Frühneuhochdeutsches Glossar (Berlin, 1912/1967’), 158; or Middle German to mix (Idem). In middle High German mérén meant to augment, increase, heighten: Matthias Lexer, Mittelhochdeutsches Taschenwörterbuch (Stuttgart, 1983’), 138.

20. Unken are serpents or basilisks.

21. Concerning the use of unrain in the Götweiger Trojanerkrieg, cf. the discussion in chapter III.
10. From the "Chronik des Burkhard Zink (1368-1468)".\footnote{\textsuperscript{2}}

"...der [Dauphin Louis] was nun kommen biß gen Mumpelgarten wol mit 20000 mannen, unter den waren, als man sagt, bei 500 rott juden; auch waren darbei graff von Armiack wol mit 1000 mannen. man sagt, deß die großen juden und auch die Armiacken die allerbösten leut und auch die unbarmherzigsten leut wären, die auf erden mugen sein..."

Translation:

[1] [Louis, later Louis XI] had arrived at Mömpelgard [Montbéliard] with 20,000 men, among whom were, they say, about 500 red Jews; the Count of Armagnac was also there with 1,000 men. They say that the big Jews and the Armagnacs are the most evil people on earth and the cruelest people that ever might live on earth.

A footnote after "1000 mannen" reads: "Am 19. Aug. 1444 zog der Dauphin in Mömpelgard ein [...]. Nach andern Nachrichten war die Schar der Söldner weit größer als Zink angiebt. [...] Das "Lied oder Cantilen von den Armen Jecken" in der Chronik des Maternus Berler S. 62 wirft dem Delphin vor: "Du hast die juden in dinner hutt, Deß soltu dich nun schammen. (You protect the Jews/You ought to be ashamed of yourself)."

\footnote{\textsuperscript{2} In: Die Chroniken der deutschen Städte vom 14. bis ins 16. Jahrhundert, V (Leipzig, 1866; =Die Chroniken der schwäbischen Städte: Augsburg, II), 174.}
11. a) From the chiroxylographic print of Der Antichrist und die fünfzehn Zeichen (c. 1450):³

fol. 5r, b
1 Der Endkrist sendet aus sein poten zu predigen und zu verkünden aller werld das er warer got messias auff ertreich kumen sey. das wirt aller werld kund gethan.

fol. 7r, b
Aber ein ander pot predigt der kunigin von amason vnd den Roten Juden. dy der gros kunig allexander in den ge=pirgen Caspie beslossen het. dy kumen aus zu des end=kristes zeyten als sanctus Jeronimus schreibt.

fol. 7r, a Einer des endkrists poten predigt aber der kristenhait das der war got messias auff erden komen se" vnd also ist sein zukunft verkundet aller kristenhait allen Juden und hayden.

fol. 7r, b
NU hebt sich an der zuzug von aller werld vnd von allen kungen zu dem endkrist dy an in glauben wellen des ersten brechen dy Roten Juden aus und tun der werld gros not und sy haissen gog vnd magog und ir zehen gescheht."⁴ und zewcht dy kungin von Amason auch zu dem endkrist.

⁴. A scribal error for "geschleht" (Geschlecht, tribe).
b) The first typographical edition of the popular Antichrist book (Strasbourg, 1480):³

fol. 1

fol. 2

fol. 3, a

fol. 3, b

fol. 4, a

fol. 4, b

fol. 5, a

fol. 5, b
fol. 6, a

fol. 6, b
[1] Hye get der Enndkrist von Capharnaym / gen ierusalem. Und do von stet geschriben in dem buch Compendio Theologie. Und unser herr flucht der selben stat och in dem ewanghelio / und spricht also we dir Caphar-

fol. 7, a

fol. 7, b

fol. 8, a

fol. 8, b

fol. 9, a
fol. 9, b

fol. 10, a

fol. 10, b

fol. 11, a [1] Der Enndkrist heysset die juden bezeichen an die stirn. und uff die rechten hand / zū einem zeichen das sy an in glouben. das stet geschriben in Appocalpsi johannis in compendio septimo.

fol. 11, b

fol. 12, a

fol. 12, b

fol. 13, a

fol. 13, b
[1] Aber ein ander der Enndkrist pot predigt der kunigin 366

fol. 14, a

fol. 14, b

fol. 15, a

fol. 15, b
[1] Der Enndkrist gibt gold und silber allen den die an in glouben und das ist der drit weg. do durch er vil volcksz an sich bringet. Das stet och geschriben in Compendio Theologie.

fol. 16, a [1] Der Enndkrist tüt aber zeichen und zoubry. und heist ein Sül red und ewurt geben. alles des man sy fragt. und tüt das durch die kunst Ars magica. das stet och in Compendio Theologie In appocalipsi Septimo.

fol. 16, b

fol. 17, a
Als der künig von Libie und sin volck geloubyg wart. Hiesz der Enndkrist den künig. und alles sin volck bezeichen an die stiren und uff die rechten hand.

Hye bringt man gefangen fur den Enndkrist. alle die / die an in mit gelouben wellen.

Der Enndkrist heisset alle die martern die nit an in gelüben wellen mit vil froh'muder marter. die vor nie mer gesehen sint. Und das ist die fünft wisz syner verkerung Do von stet ouch geschrieben in compendio.

fol. 21, b
[1] Der Enndkrist vellt nider alsz ob er tod sy. und schlofft durch zouber list. Also das all fürsten. und herren und menigklich meint er sy tod. und heben denn an zu klagen und zu schryen umb iren herren.

fol. 22, a

fol. 22, b
[1] Der Endkrist macht durch die krafft des tu'fels und durch zouberiq das feGr von hymel vellet uff syn junqer. des überheben sy sich denn und sprechen sy syn besser dann die junger unsers herren cristi ihesu die den heiligen geist enpfiegeng.

fol. 23

fol. 24

fol. 25

fol. 26

fol. 27
[1] So der Enndkrist syn leben in aller bosheit vollendet und ein bo'sz end genomen hat So kumen denn aber durch die verhencknüsz gottes. Die heiligen propheten Helyas Translation of the Antichrist book:

[1] [1] Here begins the story of the Antichrist, taken and drawn from many books, how and when he will be born. Our first concern is what Jacob, the [5] first patriarch, did when he was about to die. He called together his twelve sons to give them his blessing, and told each one in particular what the future held for him. When he came to his son called Dan, he said these words: "Dan shall judge his people [10] as one of the tribes of Israel. Let Dan be a viper on the road, a horned adder in the path, that bites the horse's fetlock, so that the rider tumbles backward." These words are interpreted in the book called the Compendium of Theology, as follows: it is fitting to compare the Antichrist to the snake called cerastes (adder), for it is [15] the nature of this serpent to lie in wait for travellers on horseback. It has four horns like the horns of a ram. With one of these horns it attacks the horse and human beings, and with the others it causes damage to other things, all of which would take too long to describe. It is also fitting to compare the Antichrist to the snake called coluber, for it prefers, according to its [20] nature, to spend time in shaded places. The activities of the Antichrist are also constantly directed toward darkness and untruth. And just as the snake cerastes, with its four horns, is dangerous, so the Antichrist presents a fourfold danger: first, with well-spoken and learned words, in which he and his messengers excel; [25] second, with many marvelous signs and portents; third, with gifts and great riches; fourth, with horrible tortures which he inflicts on people who refuse to believe in him. The Gospel of Matthew says, concerning this time: "It will be a time of great distress; there has never been such a time from the beginning of the world until now, and will never be again. If that time of troubles were not cut short, [30] no living thing could survive; but for the sake of God’s chosen it will be cut short."

[35] [fol. 2; 1] Here sits the father of the Antichrist, courting his own daughter in fleshly lust. She does what he wants and becomes pregnant with the Antichrist.

[fol. 3,a; 1] Jacob tells his son Dan what the future will bring, with these words: Dan shall judge his people as one of the tribes of Israel. Let Dan be a coluber on the road, a cerastes in the path. As has already been noted. And after these words he said "For thy salvation [5] I wait in hope, 0 Lord."

[fol. 3,b; 1] Here the Antichrist is conceived in his mother's womb by the power of the Devil who leads him and fills him with all evil and all wickedness. A father sleeps with his daughter; he is the the father of the Antichrist.

[fol. 4,a; 1] The Antichrist will be born in a city called 'Great Babylon', and he will be full of all vices and wickedness, for the Devil uses his entire might for the task. And this is shown by the book that is called the Compendium of Theology, in the seventh chapter.

[fol. 4,b; 1] Here the Antichrist devotes his attention to unchaste and promiscuous coupling with women, in the city of Bethsaida. Thus says the Compendium as well. And our Lord curses that city in the Gospel, when he says "Woe to you, Bethsaida".

[fol. 5,a; 1] In Jerusalem the Antichrist has himself circumcised according to the old law, and says to the Jews that he is the Messiah promised to them, for whom they have waited for so long. And this is also in the Compendium. And when he dares to claim to be God, his [5] good angel leaves him, as the Gloss on the Apocalypse says.

[fol. 5,b; 1] Here the Jews begin to rebuild the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, which was destroyed many ages ago by the Roman emperors Titus and Vespasian. And the Jews will say that their God has come. This is in the Compendium, in the eighth book of the seventh [5] chapter.

[fol. 6,a; 1] The Antichrist has in his following masters who teach him how to make gold and to perform other sorceries and evil craft. And this happens in the city of Chorazin. And this is also written in the Compendium of Theology. And our Lord curses the same city in the Gospel, when [5] he says "Woe to you, Chorazin."\[75\]

[fol. 6,b; 1] Here the Antichrist goes down from Capernaum toward Jerusalem. The Compendium of Theology also has something to say about this. And the Lord also curses this same city in the Gospel, saying "Woe to you, [5] Capernaum."

[80] [fol. 7,a; 1] Between the secret advent of the Antichrist and his public appearance, Elijah and Enoch come out of Paradise to preach against the Antichrist for three years. This is also written in the Compendium of Theology, in the seventh book, in [5] the eleventh chapter.

[fol. 7,b; 1] Here the prophet Elijah preaches to holy Christendom against the Antichrist. And he is clothed in sack-cloth. This is written in the Book of Virtue.

[90] [fol. 8,a; 1] Here the other prophet, Enoch, is preaching to Christendom, [and is; misprint] to warn them of the Antichrist's wickedness. And he is also clothed in sack-cloth. This is also written in the Book of Virtue.

[fol. 8,b; 1] The Antichrist destroys the Law so far as he is able, in order to take the place that our Lord occupied. And this is written in the Compendium of Theology, in the seventh book, in the eighteenth chapter.

[fol. 9,a; 1] Here the Antichrist begins to preach a new doctrine and a new law. And this is the first way in which he deceives the world with well-chosen words, as he is able to do. And the aforementioned Compendium says this in the seventh chapter.

[fol. 9,b; 1] Here the Antichrist begins to practice the second means by which he deceives the world, that is with marvelous signs and portents. He stirs up the winds, and orders the sea to rise up and go down again. The book called the Compendium also says this in the seventh book, in the ninth [5] chapter, as well as the Gloss of the Apocalypse.

\[11\]. Luke 10,15: "And as for you Capernaum, will you be exalted to the skies? No, brought down to the depths!"
The Antichrist makes barren trees bloom, and dry out again quickly, and he changes the nature of the air. This is also written in the Compendium of Theology.

Here the Antichrist works more signs. He causes a giant to hatch from an egg, and a fortress to hang from a thread, and a hart to leap out of a stone.

The Antichrist has the Jews marked on the forehead and the right hand, as a sign that they believe in him. This is written in the Apocalypse of John in the seventh book of the Compendium.

The Antichrist sends out his emissaries to preach and to announce to the entire world that he, the true God and Messiah, has come to earth. This is announced to the whole world.

Here an apostle of the Antichrist preaches to the king of Egypt and all of his land, as it is written in the Gloss on Daniel, to bring (him and) the three kings described in the following passages under his power as his first vassals.

Another ambassador of the Antichrist preaches to the king of Libya and his people concerning his God, the Messiah, to convert the king to faith in the Antichrist, because he has come as the true Messiah and true God on earth.

But another of the Antichrist’s apostles preaches to the king of the land of the Moors that the true Messiah and God has come to earth, and that he should believe in him without reservation.

And another emissary (of the Antichrist) preaches to the Queen of the Amazons and to the Red Jews whom King Alexander enclosed in the Caspian Mountains. These same Jews will come out at the time of the Antichrist, as St. Jerome writes.

And one of the Antichrist’s emissaries preaches to Christendom that the true God and Messiah has come to earth, and thus his arrival is announced to all of Christendom, all the Jews and the heathen.

Now begins an ingathering from all over the world and of all the kings who decide to believe in him. First of all the Red Jews break out and fiercely attack the whole world, and these Jews are called Gog and Magog and their ten tribes. And the Queen of the Amazons also joins the Antichrist.

The king of Egypt, the king of Libya and the king of the land of the Moors come with a great following to the Antichrist, in accordance with what they have heard concerning him in sermons and preaching.

The Antichrist distributes gold and silver to all who believe in him. This is the third means by which he attracts many people to his side. This is also written in the Compendium of Theology.

The Antichrist also works signs and sorcery. He makes a column answer any question put to it, which he does through the magical arts. This is also written in the Compendium of Theology in the section on Revelation 7.

The king of Egypt, the king of the land of the Moors and all their subjects are marked by order of the Antichrist on the forehead and on the right hand.

The king of Libya is not willing to believe in the Antichrist unless he makes his father and mother rise from the dead. And the Antichrist does so. This is an example of the fourth means by which he subverts the order of the world, that is, with marvelous signs. And this is in [5] the Compendium of Theology, book seven, chapter nine.

After the king of Libya and his people put their faith in the Antichrist, he has the king and all his people marked on the forehead and on the right hand.

The Antichrist's messengers bring all manner of people to their master: priests, monks, ladies, lords, knights and varlets, burghers and peasants, and other people, as well as all those who choose to believe in him and his teachings.

Here all those who do not want to believe

---

1. A reference to Rev. 13,16-17; Rev. 7,3-4 speaks of the seal placed on foreheads of God's servants.
in the Antichrist are brought in chains before him.

The Antichrist orders the martyrdom of all those who will not believe in him with many outlandish tortures never seen before or ever again after. And this is the fifth means by which he works his perversion of the world. This is also described in the Compendium.

Then these people hide for fear of a hideous death, but hunger drives them forth again. They are not allowed to buy anything unless they are marked with the sign of the Antichrist. At this time, brother accuses brother and sister accuses sister. Thus [5] says the Gospel.

Here the Antichrist sits in his highest majesty, and raises himself up above all other gods, and above everything that belongs to God. And he blasphemes against God. This is written in the Compendium and in Revelation.

The Antichrist orders the saintly prophets Elijah and Enoch to be murdered at Jerusalem. And there they lay unburied for three-and-a-half days, as no-one dares to bury them. This is in Revelation.

The teachers lose all esteem, and none of them preaches any more. Then the saintly prophets, Elijah and Enoch are resuscitated by angels of God. And this is made known to those who murdered them. [This is] in the Compendium of Theology.

The Antichrist falls down as if he were dead, and sleeps by magical means, so that all princes and lords and everyone else thinks he is dead. Then they begin to lament and scream over their lord.

On the third day, the Antichrist awakens and says to the princes and lords, and to all the rest of the people: See now that I am the true God and a human being!" And they kneel down right away and worship him.

The Antichrist uses magic and the power of the Devil to make fire to fall from heaven on his disciples. This causes them to brag that they are better than the disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ, who received the [inspiration of] the Holy Spirit.

The Antichrist call together all princes, lords, Christians and heathens, Jews and all others who believe in him, and orders them to make their way to the Mount of Olives, saying he plans to ascend to heaven.

[fol. 24; 1] The Antichrist orders the devils to carry him aloft. And our Lord blasts him with the Spirit of His mouth. The Gloss to Revelation 13 says 'Michael, kill him, for I will tolerate injustice no longer'. Thus says the Compendium of Theology.

[fol. 25; 1] Thereupon the devils take the Antichrist off to Hell, for he was created by the Devil's counsel and inspiration.

[fol. 26; 1] After the Antichrist is destroyed, his disciples say that they have neither God nor lord, and live sinfully according to the lusts of their flesh. But they are given twenty-five days in case they might yet regret their sins. This is also written in the Compendium of Theology.

[fol. 27; 1] After the Antichrist has ended his life in utter wickedness and found a bad end, God sends the prophets Elijah and Enoch to preach the Christian faith in all the lands that had submitted to the Antichrist, and they convert princes and lords and everyone else, so that they all become Christians, and there is only one faith in all the world, as Scripture says: "There will be one shepherd and one flock". And then no-one knows for certain when Judgment Day will come, for it is feared to be so close that the peasant leaves his plough, his livestock and his clothes in the field and runs home for fear that Judgment Day will overtake him in the fields. And Scripture says that our Lord will shorten the days that follow for the sake of his chosen ones, for they might otherwise fall back into wicked disbelief on account of excessive misery and terror, as the Compendium of Theology says.
weyst wissentlich wol / das es erlogen ist / dann man findt es in keyner schrift / mich verwundert das du dich solcher deiner erdichten lügen ni schembst / dann wer es war / sye waren lengest kommen und hetten euch erloßt. Der Jud. Ach lieber Herr oder freündt / das sey weyt von uns / das wir solche ding sagen oder erdichten soloten / wir haben disse ding klaßlich in unser schrift / unnd wann es nit uffskeptig oder war / so schrib das der Talmut nit / und uff das jr den ursprung dieser Jüden woha'r sye kommen seindt vernemen mo'cht / so solt ir wissen / do uff ein zeit der groß künig Alexander gar nahe die gantze welt bezwungen het / und als er mit seiner macht zu Jherusalem
kam / den Tempel / das heylig volck / ind jren Gotz dienst gesehen / unnd auch das vil bo'ser menschen waren / gemerckt / hett er so grossen zorn / das er sye all die frommen mit den bo'sen wolt ertö'dten / doch erbarmet er sich jrer / und liesse sye mit grossen hauffen auß dem landt treiben / unnd als sye nun all durch das grosse gebirg bey dem wu'tende mo'r gelegen getriben waren / hatt er durch Anrußung seines

fol. D v'
1 Gots. oder vileicht auß verhencknüß unsers Gottes / oder aber durch zaubery das hohe gebirg / dadurch er sie het lassen fu'ren zusammenschlien-se / also das die selben Juden zwischen dem wu'tenden mo'r und bergen biß auff heitigen tag / beschlossen sein / und nit erlediget mo'gen werden / auß diser ursach / wir haben in unserm Talmut / das solichs gebirg so hoch spitzig und scharppf / auch von Thieren so ungehür sey / daz nymandt darüber zu kommen möglicht ist.
Auch das mo'hr das inn unser sprach genant würdt Sambation / und in teutsch das wu'tendi mo'r / uff der anderen seiten so sehr wu'te unnütobe / unnd nymmer mehr raste / das auch nyemandt darüber mo'ge schiffen / alleyn am freytag nach mittag zu sechs uhren / zwischen diser zeit so steht es still / und wu'tet nit / unnd man mochte wolt darüber faren in diser zeit / so feiren wir den Sambtag / unnd der freytag wer uns und jn zukürz über züfahren. Anders die rodtten Juden weren la'ngst kommen und hetten uns erloßt. ¶ Der Christ. O du unsa' liger Jüde schembestu dich deiner offenbaren lügen nit / daz du sagest die rodtigen Juden do'rffen des freytags oder sambstags nit ha'rf und jr hinüber das wu'tend mo'rf faren / wie vil Juden seindt seidt der zeit ha'rf von allen landen zu Jherusalem gefaren / die manig mal widerwertigs windes halben jar unnd tag mu'ssen

fol. D vi'
1 uff dem mo'r faren / unnd jren Sabath mu'ssen brechen / ist es den selben keyn schandt oder sünd / noch vil weniger wer es auch schandt daz sye die rodtigen Jüden einen Sabath brechen / und herüber ka'mend euch zu erlo'sen / und das gelobt landt wider besessen. Es ist als narren-werck was du sagst / unnd wider alle redlich-keyt.
If you ask a Jew, young or old, 'In whom do you place your trust, you Jews, that you are so stubborn and arrogant, even though you see very well that your kingship and temple [power and salvation] are long past, given that there is no poorer and more God-forsaken people in the whole world than you?' They answer and say: 'We still have a king and leaders in another country.' So you ask: 'Where and in which country are they? I have visited many lands and have never heard of any kingdom or jurisdiction that you can or might still claim.' The Jew's answer: 'We still have a king the other side of Babylonia, in the Caspian Mountains. He is descended from the tribe of Judah. These same Jews are the Red Jews and strong. There are as many more of them than there are Christians in all of Christendom, as you Christians are now more than us.' You can tell this easily, for out of the twelve tribes of Israel, not more than two, that is the tribe of Reuben and of Gad, have managed to come out, and all these lands are full of them [1]. Numbers 32. And here it is important to note how immense the host of the Ten Tribes must be, who are enclosed there, who can still help us and who will free us from our imprisonment.' To which you answer: 'I have already said that I have travelled far in my day, and seen many a traveller, but never heard any of them who had seen even one of these Jews of whom you speak, and you yourself know very well that it is all made-up, because it cannot be found in Scripture. I am amazed that you are not ashamed of these whopping lies of yours. For if this were true, they would have

---

4. The Red Jews are in the same proportion to all of Christendom as Christendom is to exiled Jewry.

15. Meaning the Gentile lands of exile.
come a long time ago and rescued you.' The Jew: 'Oh, dear sir or friend, far be it from us that we should have said or invented such things. We have clear evidence of them in our Scriptures. And if it were not reliable or true, it would not be in the Talmud.
And in order that you may know the origin of these Jews and where they come from, you ought to know that long ago, when the great King Alexander almost conquered the entire world,
he approached Jerusalem with his armies, and saw the Temple, the holy people [sc. Israel] and their divine service, and he saw that there were many wicked people among them. He became so angry that he wanted to kill them all, the pious and the wicked. But he had mercy on them and had them driven out of Israel in a great mass.
And when they all had been driven between the great mountains that border on the Wild Sea, he invoked his

[fol. D v']

god, or perhaps it happened by the providence of our God, or even by magical means, and he made the high mountains, between which he had let the Jews be driven, close in on each other, so that these same Jews were enclosed between the Wild Sea and the mountains until the present day, and cannot be freed, for this reason: we have in our Talmud that these mountains are so high, pointy and sharp and so full of dangerous animals that no-one can possibly cross them. Furthermore, the sea that is called Sambation in our language and in German the Wild Sea rages so wildly on the other side -- and never rests -- that no-one can cross it [by ship] except from Friday at six o'clock in the afternoon until Saturday at six o'clock in the afternoon. Between these times it is still, and does not rage, and one might well traverse it at this time, but we celebrate on Saturday, and Friday alone would not be long enough to make the trip. Otherwise the Red Jews would have broken out long ago and liberated us.' The Christian: 0 you damnable Jew, are you not ashamed of your evident lies when you say that the Red Jews cannot come across on Friday or Saturday and you cannot cross the Wild Sea to them? How many Jews have travelled since time immemorial from all countries to Jerusalem, and underway often been forced on account of unfavorable winds to spend

[fol. D vi']
[1] years on the high seas, and to break their Sabbath? It is no sin or shame for them, so how much less would it be shameful for the Red Jews to break one Sabbath [5] and come across to free you and to occupy the Holy Land once again? Everything you say is nonsense and against all honesty and good sense. [...]'}
Haec quidem de pertinacia mulierum apud Iudaeos. Igitur cum ex Iudaeo viro aut muliere seu iuvene sive senes percontaris: quid sit ipsum quod ita eos erigat in spem ac patiendi fiduciam / quando tam sunt pertinaces ut etiam morte minime vereri videantur: tunc ille quisquis est, seu vir seu mulier, ita respondet. 'Nos quidem etsi hic videmur destituti omni principatu atque dominio: sunt tamen nobis reges ac principes.' Tunc si quis rursum ex eo, in qua parte orbis terrarum reges et principes dominia ac regna possident, de quorum certe potestatibus aut dominationibus nichil hactenus exploratum fuit, tum ille: 'Ultra baylonem in orientem in monte caspio, rex nobis est de vera propagine iuda. Et qui sub illo sunt: ipsi quoque veri Iudaei [margin: Figmentum de Iudaeis rubris] appellantur / et qui nunc vulgo dicuntur rubri Iudaei atque rubri Iudaei atque ro-[40]bustissimi: quorum numerus multo maior est quam Christianorum. Nam ex duodecim tribus Israel duae tantum dispersae sunt per

---

13. Victor von Carben, De vita et moribus Iudeorum:

[78' / fol. o iiiii]

---

17. A Latin translation of the Juden Büchlein, the De vita et moribus Iudeorum Victoris de Carben olim iudei nunc Christi miserationse Christiani Libellus (= Book I of the Opus aureum) appeared together with an edition of Ricold de Montacroix' Contra sectam Mahumeticam non indignis scitu libellus at Paris in 1511, printed ex officina H. Stephani (pp. 63-86). This work is at Wolfenbüttel (151.51 Th.), in the Bayerische Staatsbibliothek (4 H.misc. 146 and 4 Inc.c.a. 1853, Beibd.1), the Hebrew Union College (Cincinnati) and the British Library (C.46. d. 5. (1.)). This passage is an almost word-for-word translation of the 1508 German version; it starts on page 78 (fol. o iiiii') of Stephanus' edition. I have added half-quotes to identify direct speech, and substituted commas for periods as necessary for a clear reading.

18. "Who are called in the vulgar tongue [German] the Red Jews ...". Here is the feeling of a contemporary translator, who feels obliged to render the German text faithfully, but to note that Red Jews is a popular expression that does not belong in Latin.

19. Cf. Juden Büchlein, "... die selben Juden seind die roden Juden unnd starcken...". These Jews are described as 'strong' or 'most fit' in contradistinction to the politically weak and dependent Jews of the diaspora.

25 Haec ille: ‘Tu vero dicere potes. Dīxi tibi o Iudaee nunquam exploratum ab homine / nec usque compertum esse ...’
14. Michael Kromer [Kramer], Eyn Underredung vom glawben: 40

[437/BN1]

1 [21; Pfarher:] Aber nun habt yr in funffzehen hundert iaren unnd lenger weder Cepter noch propheten gehabt.
Jacob: Wir haben unsern Cepter noch nyhe gentzlich ver-[25]lorn, sunder alwegen ko'nige, fursten und propheten gehabt.

Pfarher: Wo do?

Jacob: Wir habenn einen in Babilonien, Auch einen in Persienn.

Pfarher: Ja, es was Daniel in Babilonie zur zeyt auch [30] gewalltig, Des gleychenn Joseph in Egipten, sie waren drumb nicht ko'nige. so mo'chts yetzundt auch zu gehen.

Jacob: Habt yr auch gehört vom wu'ten meer, wie das wu'tet unnd nymmer ruget byß auff den Saboth, do Gott ge-ruget hat nach der scheinffunge? auf, die stundte stehet es [35] styl, und wer do handelt, der mus auff die zeyt heru'ber [438; 1] kommen. Nun haben wir ein gepott, den Saboth zu feyren unnd wirdt auch festiqklich von uns

---

40. Eyn Underredung vom glawben, durch herr Micheln kromer, // Pfarrherr zu Cunitz, und eynem Judischen Rabien, mit // namen Jacob vonn Brucks, geschehen ynß // Richters haueß do selbst zu Cunitz. // Mitwoch nach Andree // M.D.xxiii. [2 December, 1523]. Beneath the title is a woodcut showing the protagonists sitting over a meal at a table, in front of a window facing a mountainous scene. With the caption 'Pfarher - Jacob Jud'. The printer was Matthes Maler of Erfurt. The pamphlet was reproduced in its entirety by Otto Clemen, ed., Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation, I (Leipzig and New York: Rudolf Haupt, 1907), 423-444 [numbered incorrectly as 344]; this volume was actually published at Halle an der Saale. This passage appears on pages 437 [numbered 337]-439 [numbered 339]; fol Bb’ - B ii’. The debaters have started to discuss the Christian interpretation of Genesis 49,10 (The scepter shall not depart from Judah...until Shiloh come...). Jacob denies that there are no Jewish kingdoms left on earth, as the pastor charges, in order to refute the argument that the political impotence of the Jews is proof that the Messiah has already come (Jesus) and the scepter [kingship] departed from Judah.
Nun wettet: es seint xii geschlecht außernad

des meerß gewest in Egipten, und nicht mehr dan eyffthalb geschlecht seint erußer

kommen im [40] außgange,1 die selbigen haben alwegen Propheten bey sich gehabt, die selbigen haben erwart, wen sie Gott wollt heymsuchen und erloßen, und diesen vergangen Sommer hatt Gott sie mit gnaden heym gesucht, dan das wasser, wie yr gehört habt, hat nur den Saboth
styll vorgestanden, oder diesen Sommer [8 ii'; 1] auff ein zeyt / hatß angefangen auff den Saboth und acht tage in rugen gestanden. So habenn die Propheten zum volcke geruffenn, das sie sollen ansehen, das sie Gott erloßen wollte, drumb sollen sie außgehen in das gelobtthe landt, das yhn [5] Gott versprochen hatte. Saget wettber, das sie yr Legaten beym Keyßer der Turcken gehabt und yn gebetten, das er yr wollte eyn rawmen das gelobte landt, dann Gott hetß yren vettern und yn eingegeben. Darauff der Turcke geantwort hat: die weylls yrer vatter ist gewest und von Gott yhn gegebenn, [10] er wollte es yn verkauffen. darauff die Juden widder geantwort: Gott hett es yn gegeben, darumb wollten sie es nicht kauffen, sunder mit dem scherdt gewyn. und zeygte an, das der Keyser der Turcken und die rothen Juden yetzundt mit dem schwerdt umb das gelobthe land fechten.

[15] Pfarher: Ist yr dann so viel, das sie so mechtig seindt?

Jacob: Ja, yr ist zu sechßmall hundertmall tausent, das byn ich gewyß. Auch wirts neulich in Druck kommen.2 der Jude was vast ein beredt man, auch auff neunnerley sprachen wol gelart, drumb stundts der Pfarher zu frieden.

[20] Pfarher: Jacob, ich lasse zu, das yr Jherusalem widder uberkommet. Aber ich lasse nicht zu, das yr das koßnickige Cepter widder erlanget, sunder die oßberkeyt denn Turcken oder Christen bleyben wirdt. Dann die Heyden haben nyhe keiner Judischenn koßwig wollt habenn noch leyden, sunder alwegen [439; 25] sich mit gewalt widder sie gesatzt. Allein von diesem Schylo oder Messias stehet geschrieben, das yn die Voßler und Heyden werden zufallenn.

1. The exodus from Egypt.

2. The pamphlet of 1523 printed below, no. 18.
[437/fol. B]

[1] [21; Pastor]: But for fifteen hundred years and more you have had neither scepter (kingship) nor prophets.

Jacob: We have never yet lost our 'scepter' completely,

[5] [25] but have always had kings, princes and prophets.

Pastor: Where then?

Jacob: We have one in Babylon, and another in Persia.

Pastor: Yes, but Daniel was a powerful man in Babylon [10] [30] as well, just as Joseph was in Egypt, but they were not kings for all that. That is probably how things are today as well.

Jacob: Have you also heard of the Wild Sea¹³, and how it rages and rests only on the Sabbath, just as God rested [15] after the Creation? At that time it is [35] calm, and anyone with business there must cross it then. But we are commanded to honor the Sabbath by resting, and we obey firmly. Furthermore: there were 12 tribes beyond the [20] sea¹⁴ in Egypt, but only eleven and a half came across [it] in the [40] exodus, and these same¹⁵ have always had prophets amongst them, and have expected God to go among them and liberate them, and this past summer God showed them his grace, for the water, as you have heard, used [25] to be calm only on the Sabbath, but this summer [fol. B 11i; 1] it stood still on the Sabbath and eight days [following]. The prophets, therefore, exhorted the Jews [30] to make them understand that God wanted to liberate them, and thus that they ought to set out for the Holy Land [19]

¹³. The Sambation, understood not as a river but as a sea.

¹⁴. It seems as though the Sambation is being confused with the Red Sea.

¹⁵. The Jews supposedly left in Egypt, who are here confused with the Ten Tribes supposed to be enclosed in the Caspian Mountains. This is characteristic of Kromer's confused, creative and confounding view of theology and divine history.
that God promised them. [He]\(^4\) says further that they\(^5\) have sent legates to the Turkish Sultan to ask him to vacate the Promised Land for them, as God had given it to their fathers and to them. To which the Turk answered: since it had been their fathers' and was given them by God, he would sell it to them. To which the Jews retorted: God gave it to them, so they were not willing to buy it, but to win it back by the sword. And [he] said that the the Turkish Sultan and the Red Jews have now resorted to arms to fight for the Promised Land.

[15] Pastor: Are there so many of them, then, that they are that powerful?

[45] Jacob: Yes; there are six hundred thousand of them. I am certain of that. And this will appear in print soon.\(^6\) The Jew [Jacob] was an extremely well-spoken man, and well-versed in nine languages, so the pastor made no further objections.

[50] [20] Pastor: Jacob, it is possible that you might well take Jerusalem once again. But it is impossible for you to regain the scepter of kingship. Authority will remain with the Turks or the Christians. For the heathen have never wanted or tolerated a Jewish king, but have always opposed this by force. But it is written of this Shiloh or Messiah that the nations and the heathens will recognize him as king. [And in which king have the nations and the Gentiles believed other than the 'Jewish King Christ'...?]

\(^4\) The unmentioned source of this tale, who is presumably also the source of the 1523 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlet; see no. 18, infra.

\(^5\) The enclosed Jews.

\(^6\) The 1523 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlet, no. 18.
Michael Kromer’s Unterredung vom Glauben (sharply abridged) in the 1550 edition of Victor von Carben’s Juden Büchlein.

[fol. T vii’d]

1 [26; Pfarrer] ... Aber nun habt ir [Juden] in fünfftzehn hundert jaren und lenger / weder Zepter noch propheten gehabt.

J[acob]: Wir haben unsern Zepter noch nye gentlich verlorn / sunder alweg künig / Fürsten / und propheten gehabt.

P[farrer]: Wo da?

[J: Wir haben einen in Babilonien / auch einen in Persien.

10 P: Ja es was Daniel in babilonie zu zeit auch gewaltig Deßgelichen Joseph in Egipten / sie waren drümb nit künige / so möchts [5] yetzund auch zu gehn.

J: die roten Jüden seind yetzund mit dem schwerdt auff umb das gelobt lande züfechten.

15 P: Ist ir dann so vil / das sie so mechtig seind?

J: Ja ir ist zu sechßmal hundert mal dausent.

P: Ich laße zu das ir Jherusalem [10] wider überkommet / Aber ich laße nit zu das ir das künigliche Zepter wider erlanget / sunder die oberkeyt / den türcken oder

20 Christen bleiben wirt.

*See above, note 33, no. 12. This passage comes from the same edition as used in no. 12; thus, the Unterredung vom Glauben was appended to this later edition of one of its primary sources; fol. T vii’–T vii*.
Translation:

[fol. T vii’d]

[1] [26; Pastor]... But you [Jews] have now for fifteen hundred years and more had neither scepter [kingship] nor prophets.

[5] Jacob: We have never yet lost our 'scepter' completely, but have always had kings, 30 princes and prophets.

Pastor: Where then?

[fol. T vii'; 1] Jacob: We have one in Babylon, and another in Persia.

[10] Pastor: Yes, but Daniel was a powerful man in Babylon as well, just as Joseph was in Egypt, but they were not kings for all that. That is probably how things [5] are today as well.

Jacob: The Red Jews have risen and taken arms to fight for the Promised Land.

[15] Pastor: Are there so many of them, then, that they are that powerful?

Jacob: Yes, there are six hundred thousand of them.

Pastor: It is possible that you might well take Jerusalem [10] once again. But it is impossible for you to regain the scepter of kingship. Authority will remain with the [20] Turks or the Christians.

[fol. Z i']

1 [5] ... Zum sechsten tro'sten sy sich gar vast der zehen geschlecht die der könig Assyrios [!] vertribe / und fu'rt sy hinder Assyrien / und setzet sy in die stett Chalo / Chovor des Bachs Goson / und in die stett Modai/
Sixth, they comfort themselves greatly with hopes about the Ten Tribes, whom King Assyrians drove away, and resettled them beyond Assyria in the cities Chalo, Chovor by the river Goson and in the city of Modai\(^1\) as you will find in the fourth book of Kings, chapter 17. I am greatly puzzled, however, why these Ten Tribes are called Red Jews. They have a firm hope that these Red Jews will come and liberate them. They also have little books in Hebrew and in German that contain many lies and tales about these Ten Tribes. They also write about a river \(^{15}\) called the Sabbathion, which rages the whole week and foams such that no-one can cross it. But during the Sabbath this river rests. And these Red Jews live on the other side of this river and that is where pepper comes from.\(^2\) On Friday, the Red Jews place sacks \(^{20}\) of pepper at the edge of the river, and then the heathen come on the Sabbath and replace the pepper with as much grain. When God wants to liberate the Jews here, he will make the river calm. Oh, dear God, how the Jews deceive themselves.\(^3\) I have asked many experienced merchants and others, but they knew nothing about (the Red Jews). How can it be possible that nothing has been heard for over twenty-two hundred years about so large a nation and so miraculous a river ...

\(^1\) II. Kings 17,6: "In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes."

\(^2\) Gog and Magog are often associated with the production of pepper. See, for example, the Persian Alexander-book: Nizami. Das Alexanderbuch (Iskandarname), trans. by J. Christoph Bürgel (Zurich, 1991; Manesse Bibliothek der Weltliteratur): "Ein Kraut wächst dort aus dem Boden, dessen Körner so scharf sind wie Pfeffer, davon essen sie [Gog und Magog] Tag und Nacht, schlafen dann und lassen nicht ab davon." (539).

\(^3\) Literally, ‘how they put birds in the bushes for themselves’. The meaning is that they deceive themselves only, and willfully.
17. Johannes Agricola, Sprichwörter (1528 and 1534):^4

Number 272:

1 Hetten wir alle eynen glauben / Gott und den gemeynen nutz vor augen / Gutten friden und recht gericht / Eyn elle / maß / und gewicht /

15 / Moschobiter / Christen / Inder / Bapst / Biscoffe / Münche / Nonnen / Sacramenter / Widertueffer / unnd der ding on zal. In disen allen ist das hertz eyner sonderlichen meynung wie moçgen sie denn eyns sein. Es ist droben gesagt aus dem Ritter Pontus / was der eyne Radt des Soldans sone riedt. Auch wie in Behmen ettwan keyne eynigkeyt hatt moçgen troffen werden / denn daß man hatt muessen zulassen / daß eyn yeder glawben mochte / was er wolle / und daß keyner den andern des glaubens halben rechtfertige. Es ist bey den Schuollerern hoch gehandelt worden / ob eynes yegklichen menschen glaube den menschen selig mache? Denn sie sagen / daß der grosse Alexander auff seine käyfe gefallen sey / und von Gott ernstlich gebetten / er wolte die Caspios montes lassen zusammen gehen / und die roten Juden verschliessen / unnd es sey also geschehen. Daher auch die Fabel erwachsen ist von den roten Juden / welche mit Enoch und Helía vor dem Jungsten tage sollen nertur kommen. Es sey nun umb die fabel wie es wil / so ist starck / daß keyn glaub selig mache / denn an Christum Jesum / wie S. Paul leret

25 / und an den Gott / welcher hatt Christum vom tode erweckt. Wer aber den glauben bekennet / den kan die welt nicht leyden / daraus folget den unfride wie es denn zu allen zeitten des Evangelij ergangen ist / wie auch Augustinus schreibt. [...]
Translation:

1 Had we all one faith,
God and the common weal in mind,
A just peace and fair courts,
The same measures for length, volume and weight,
One coinage and a solid currency,
Life would be good all over the world.

If I had to make a wish and wishing were of any use, I would wish these things for the world and hope it enjoyed them, but I am afraid that the world will remain the world, and wishing will not help. You can wish or fart into a bag as much as you like, but in vain, as these things will not fill it. Unity cannot be expected in this world, as each person teaches as his thoughts teach him.
There are in this world Jews, heathens, Turks, Saracens, Muscovites, Christians, Indians, the Pope, bishops, monks, nuns, Sacramentarians, Anabaptists and the like, countless numbers of them. All of these people believe in their hearts different things, so how can they be one?
I have mentioned above in reference to the story of the Knight Pontus what one counsellor advised the son of the Sultan. And how in Bohemia no unity can be arrived at, except that each had to be allowed to believe what he wants, and no-one has to justify his beliefs to anyone else. The scholastics have spent much time on the question whether the [individual] faith of each person will save that person. For they say that Alexander the Great fell on his knees and prayed earnestly to God to move the Caspian Mountains together and enclose the Red Jews, and this is said to have happened. This is the origin of the fable concerning the Red Jews, who are supposed to appear with Enoch and Elijah before Judgement Day. Whatever we believe concerning this fable, it is certain that no belief saves except belief in Christ Jesus, as St. Paul teaches, and in God, who raised Christ from the dead. But he who confesses the faith is hated by the world. Hence aris disputes and differences, as has happened at all times of Gospel preaching, as Augustine writes.
18. Text of the 1523 'Red and Black Jews' pamphlet:\textsuperscript{15}

fol. a i'
1 Von ainer grosse meng
unnd gewalt der Juden die lange zeyt mit unwonhaftigen Wusten beschlossen und verborgen gewesen/Ietzunder außgebrochen und an tag kom= 5 men soyn/Dreyssig tagrayß von Jherusalem sich nydergeschlagen/Was sy fu'rgenom= men haben findet man nach laut dises
Sendbriefs zum tayl glaub=

\textsuperscript{15}. In length 4 sheets in-quarto, this pamphlet was printed by Heinrich Steiner at Augsburg in 1523; Wolfenbüttel 196.14 Hi (9), reproduced in Hans-Joachim Köhler’s microfiche collection Flugschriften des frühen 16. Jahrhunderts (Zug, 1978–), Fiche 1204, no. 3374, made from München SB 4° Ded. 102/4 (Res). I have chosen to reproduce this version, even though it seems to be posterior to the version reprinted in Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahrhunderten der Reformation, ed. Otto Clemen, Leipzig and New York: Rudolf Haupt, 1907, I, 442-444. The version reproduced here lacks a closing parenthesis at fol. a ii’, line 3, after "wissent", and an opening parenthesis on the same page, line 24, before "Als", punctuation present in Clemen’s version and necessary for any sensible reading of the text. The closest edition to the present text is Panzer 2616/Wolfenbüttel 131.1. Th (27)/Köhler Fiche 1044, Nr. 2636, which is set in the same type and lines, with the same woodcut. The spelling of the latter is slightly different from the text reprinted here, but belongs to the same dialect area (upper Swabian/Bavarian) and was simply another edition, produced by Steiner, probably after the present edition: Panzer 2616 shows signs of degeneration in the text characteristic of another remove from the source (Clemen’s version), namely the absence of certain words that are present in other, earlier editions. Panzer 2616 is missing in fol. a ii’, line 26 the participle "gethan"; on fol. a iii’, line 2, "geselschaft" is misspelled "gesche'schafter". Panzer 2616 is missing the same parentheses as the present edition, and therefore belongs to the same family. It probably was typeset quickly to meet a large demand after the present pamphlet (itself probably the second edition) was sold out. I propose that the descent of the texts is as follows: Clemen’s text, Panzer 2082, Wolfenbüttel 196.14 Hi (9), Panzer 2616, then BSB München Rar 4290, which is in Bavarian dialect; the print, type and composition are entirely different from the preceding four and point to a Bavarian printer.
liche unterricht.
10 1523

fol. a ii'
1 Es ist ain jud auß Welschen Landen kommen/der meynem genedigen herrn
von Triest glaubwirdig 5 mit briefen so im zu geschickt seindt worden be-zyget/Anzaygt wy
vor etlichen verschinen tagen brief und ware kuntschaft auß Jerusalem und Damasco und 10 andern unnd nemlichen an seyn Vettern inn Welschlanden zukommen anzaygent wie ain grosse menge und macht der Juden Nemlich biß in die fünnf oder Sechß mal hundert Tausent in das Egipten landt ankommen und sich dafür Jherusalem XXX tag rayß weyt gelegert oder nýder geschlagen/Auß den xii geschickt=
er Juden zu bottschaftten erwoßt unnd dem Türkischen Kayser zu geschicket worden/den zuwermanen/das er in ir alt unnd Vatterlich erbland das ist terra promissionis wyderumb zuaygne wa aber nit/wollen sy das selb mit gewalt und streyt selbst eynnemen unnd wa sach wer/das der Türk nit glawben woldt/das sy recht Juden weren/Erbietten sy sich mit grossen zaychen das dann der Moses und ander propheten vor nye gethan sollichs zu bewerden/und als der Jud anzyaygt so sein es schier Swartz auch rodt Juden und auß den hinder=

fol. a ii'
1 sten Wüsten oder unnden bey Affrica herauß kommen die allweg bißher (so lang sy dann von Jherusalem vertiben/Nyemant wissent []) ver borgen gelegen dann auch nyemant vor gros= 5 sen Wüsten und wilden gyfftigen Thieren und schlagen zu inen noch sy herauß zu uns haben kommen mügen das dann glaublich sein mage denn die weyl sy in Affrica gewont das man
nent den tritten tayl der welt ist fast ain un= 10 gewonlichs land/wie mans denn in der Geo= graphay und Hystorien glaubwirdig erfert und den geleerten der Geograffey wol wissent ist das nit vil menschen vor grosser hytz unnd wüsten auch wilden thyeren da wonent auß= genommen die ort so dem Mediterranischen Moör die Welschen/Hispanischen und Kriechischen landt anschawent und anstossent/des selbige etwa wol erbaut mit Steten und Dorf= fern da auch ain land im andern ist da lau= ter Schwartz Moren seindt/sonst was sich hinder gegen mitternacht sich erstreckt/ist mit grossen wa‘elden unnd bergen verwu‘st das kain mensch in etliche Tausent oder hundert meylen wonnt/Unnd das gantz erdtrich [() Als Plinius schreybt) Vol mit vil der vergyffen thieren ist/dergleichen man sonst in der gantz= en welt nit findt/ist auff das dem glaubwir= digen glezych das yetz gemelte Juden vileicht

fol. a iii'
1 (wie dann der Jud auch anzaygt) vonn men= schlicher geselschafft ab gesonndert vor den wilden und gyfftigen thieren und gro‘sten wu‘sten nit haben mügen herauß ziehen noch ander leütt zu jnen kommen/wie sie aber yetz erst herauß kommen/Sagt der Jud es sey auß der verhengknuß gottes geschehen dann alle bo‘se vergyffte thyer und würm (von wegen sam= mlung der wasser so vor grosser gyß schyer al= le flüß und bech in Africa auß gethaylt) dem Moör zugelafften/unnd als sy in Egiptenland haben gelegen/haben sy ain groß unngewon= liche (der zeyt nach) finsternuß bey der nacht gesehen dar ab sy erschrocken/aber vil meer die Caldeyischen Astronomi daselbst auff die Erd nidergefallen mit grossem geschray und wain en zü den Juden gesagt/ir und anderer vo‘lck= er glauben soll zergeen und der yrrig das ist der Juden glaub soll widerumb gemert wer= den/zü dem großkanzler gesagt dem Juden wie er auch vor etlichen tagen durch brieff ver= nommen hab/wye das ganntz Jüdisch landt Jerusalem Egipten und Arabia sampt auch vil andern Landen dem hayligen grab ange= ho‘rendt/vom Türcken abgefallen unnd sich dem Sophoy under geben unnd gentlich für genommen sich und das haylige grab vor dem Türckischen gewalt zu beschyrmen/darauff

fol. a iii'
1 der Türck etlich vil schiff auff Alkayr wyder den Sophoy geschickt/Herwider auch der Sop= hoy auff dem Moʳ unnd landt sich wider den Türcken gestercket hatt/dardurch man verhalt sollichs allain ursach sein das der Türck yetz den Sommer auf Ungern oder ander land gezoge sey/Die botschafft der Juden ist noch bei dem Türkischen Kayser was sy für antwort oder abfertigung von im empfahen wirt vermaint der Jud auff das kürzest zu wysen thon.
Translation:

[fol. a i']

[1] Concerning a great multitude and host of Jews, long enclosed and hidden by uninhabitable deserts, who have now broken out and appeared

[5] [in Egypt], where they are encamped thirty days' march from Jerusalem. What they propose to do is to be found in the following letter, in a report that is in part believable.

10 1523.

[fol. a ii']

[1] A Jew has come from Latin parts with a credible report supported by letters that were

[5] sent to him [that are in his possession], and made known to my lord of Triest that a good number of days ago, letters and genuine accounts sent from Jerusalem and Damascus and [10] elsewhere reached cousins of his in his country. These letters relate that a great multitude and host of Jews, more precisely as many as five or six hundred thousand, have arrived in the land of Egypt and made

[15] camp thirty days' march from Jerusalem.
They chose twelve capable Jews from amongst themselves as emissaries and sent them to the Turkish emperor [sultan] to admonish him to return to them their ancient and [20] ancestral homeland, that is the Promised Land.

If he should not do so, [the emissaries were to tell him that] the Jews were prepared to conquer this land by force of arms. Should the Turk not believe they were real Jews, they were to prove their identity

[25] with great portents, such as Moses and the other prophets never did. And this Jew reports that they are all black and red Jews, and have come out of the uttermost

[fol. a ii']

[1] deserts or dunes of Africa, who until now have been entirely hidden (ever since they were driven from Jerusalem, their whereabouts completely unknown). For noone could reach them, on account of the great deserts and wild, poisonous beasts and serpents, nor could they come out to us. This is all quite believable, because they were living in Africa, which is called the Third Part of the world, and which is a highly unusual land - as one hears from the reliable descriptions of Geography and histories, and as those learned in geography well know, not many people live there, because of the great heat, deserts and dangerous beasts; with the exception of those countries that border the Mediterranean Sea, and face the Latin, Spanish and Greek lands, and adjoining territories, which are fairly well built-up with towns and villages, where there is one country within another (or: in the second, i.e., Spain?) inhabited by genuine black Moors. Those other parts that extend southwards are a wasteland of great forests and mountains, where no human being lives for many thousands or hundreds of miles around, and the entire land (as Pliny writes) is filled by great numbers of poisonous animals, such as are not found anywhere else in the world. It therefore seems credible that these Jews

(fol. a iii')

(as the Jew himself claims), perhaps isolated from all other human society, have not been able to leave their country and come out to other people, on account of the wild, poisonous animals and the great deserts. But by whatsoever means they have now come out, the Jew says, it has been arranged by God, for all the wicked poisonous animals and serpents have been swept out to sea (on account of great flooding that swelled all the rivers and streams in Africa). While the Jews were encamped in Egypt, they saw a great (and for the time) unusual darkness during the night, which frightened them greatly. But more importantly, the Chaldean astronomers there fell to the ground with much wailing and weeping, and said to the Jews that their own faith [that of the astronomers] and the faiths of other peoples would disappear, and the mistaken faith, that is, the Jewish faith, would be increased once again. To the high chancellor [was] said to the Jew,\(^6\) that he had heard some days ago that all the Jewish land, Jerusalem, Egypt and Arabia along with many other countries that belong to the Holy Sepulchre had seceded from the Turk and submitted to the Sophoy [Persian ruler], and that they fully intended to defend themselves and the Holy Sepulchre against Turkish aggression. In response,

\[\text{[fol. a iii']}

[1] the Turk has dispatched a great many ships to Cairo against the Sophoy, who has in turn increased his forces at sea and on land against the Turk. Thus, it seems that this is the sole reason for the Turkish advance on Hungary and other countries this summer. The Jewish legation is still at the court of the Turkish emperor. The Jew claims he will know very soon what sort of answer or treatment they will receive from him.

\(^6\). The meaning is unclear; the text seems to be incomplete or corrupt in all four editions known. I suggest as a reconstruction "Zudem [hat der] Großkanzler gesagt dem Juden, ..."; i.e., "Furthermore, the high chancellor (presumably of the lord of Trieste) said to the Jew..."
19. Text of the 1562 pamphlet:

fol. a i'
1 Neuwe Zeitung/Von dem grossen Heer der roten Juden/so auß den Gebirgen/Caspi genant/in Asia 5 herfür kommen.
Dise Juden nennen sich von den sechs geschlechten Israhel/Wie ihr nachuolgendts ehö'ren werden.
10 Neußlich geschribenn
auß Constantinopel/dis
M.D.LXII.
Jars.

fol. a ii'
1 Neuwe Zeitunge/Von dem grossen
Heer der Roten Juden/so auß den Gebirgen
Caspi genant/herfürkommen.
Dise Rote Juden nennen
5 sich von den sechs geschlechten Israels/
Nemlich vom geschlechte Ruben/vom geschlechte Gad/vom geschlechte Assar/vom geschlechte Isaac/vom

---

57. The text is taken from Zentralbibliothek Zürich 27.471a5; listed in Emil Weller, Die ersten deutschen Zeitungen 1505–1599 (Tübingen, 1872; =BLVS, 111), 173, Nr. 253: at that time in Zürich and Greifswald. This edition was in all likelihood printed at Nuremberg. There is another edition, in which the word "rot" in the phrase "rote Juden" has been replaced throughout with the word "neu"; other than that, the text is the same: Wolfenbüttel Gv Kapsel 8(18), formerly 260.13 Qu(odlibetica). Weller lists a copy of this secondary edition at Breslau/ Wroclaw (Ibid., 422, Nr. 23) as well as a third version similar to the second, but with a few small differences in typography (Ibid., 422, Nr. 24, also at Breslau). The replacement of 'red' with the word 'new' seems to come from the description of these people in the original, fol. a iii', line 5, as "ein neuw Geschlecht der Juden": the printer or pirate, caught up in the uncertainty expressed on the same page, lines 17-18 ("aber was das ist/verstehe ich nicht"), dropped the odd and perhaps no longer immediately recognizable term "red Jews" in favour of a term used in the text.
geschlechte Zabulon/und vom geschlecht Ma= 10
nasse/und hat ein jeglichs geschlecht seine Ober= sten/und seine eigene Fahnen/die ziehen mit gros= sem Heer/und seind jre Obersten die sie haben wie hernach folget.

Der Oberste über das volck vom Geschlecht
15
Ruben/der ist ein Oberster General über das gan tze Heer/ist ein frewdiger wilder mensch/heyßt mit namen Ilian/der selbig hat under jme zwey tausten Mann/die seind auff die ringe art ange= thön/mit Taŕtschen/und grossen breyten schwer= tern/alle inn Seiden gekleydet/ihrer Fahnen ist schwartz und graw/darinnen ist ein hund ge= malet/welcher einem Hirschen nachhenget/und ist darbey auff jre Sprache geschrieben/Todt o= der lebendig
20
Der Oberst über das Volck von dem geschlech=
fol. a ii'
1 ge Gath/ist einer genannt Jonas/der hat under jhm siben tausten Pferde/die haben in jren Fah= nen einen Falcken/der in das gefeß naget/mit di=
ser worten: Du oder ich mußsen brechen.
5
Der Oberste über das Volck Assar/ist einer genannt Galleson/der will ein Jüdischer Marg graff sein/und hat under jm Fünfftzehen taustent Mann zu Pferde/unnd sibentzehen Tausent zu füß/die haben ein rohten Fahnen/darinnen ist 10 ein Jungkfraw in einem grünen kleyde gemalet/
und vor jhr einen Löwen stehen/mit den worten:
Ich hoffe das wilde zam zu machen.

Der Oberste über das Volck von dem gesch= lechte Isaschar/nennet sich einen Graffen von Al= 15
lar/der selbig hat unter jhm zwentzig Tausent Pferde/darunder seind vier taustent Pferde mit Armbrosten/und haben in jren Rennfahnen ei= nen mann mit einer Ketten/mit denen worten:
Meine Ketten wirdt andere binden.

20
Der Oberste über das volck von dem geschlech tte Zabulon/heyßt mit nammen Athan/nennet sich einen Hertzog Persolda/der hat under jhm Fünfftzehen taustent Hackenschützen/die haben eine blawe Fahnen/darinn einen verdorbenen
Baum/mit den worten: Ich bemu'he mich wi- der zu grünen.

Der Oberste über das volck von dem geschlech- te Manasse/ist einer mit nammen Gisar/nennen sich einen Marggraffen von Vorrey/unnd hat under jhm zwolff Tausent Füßknecht/mit leder angethon/das man nichd dadurch stechen kan/die haben eine grüne Fahnen/darinne einen alten Mann mit Pantoffeln/mit disen worten: Ich hoffe noch vil zu erwarten.

Diß alles schreiben die Türckischen Waschen her/so der Türcke an der Grenzten hat/und ha- ben die juden hie zu Constantinopel/und sonst im lande der Zeitunge heymlisch ein grosse freü= de/Unnd dieweil sunst niemand zu dem Volcke hat ko'nnen kommen/haben doch die andern Ju= den allzeit jhre heymlische Practickcn zu jhnem ge= habt/und soll noch über die sechs Geschlecht/ei= ne unză'liche mennige von dem gemeynen Poťffel zu Roß und füssse mitziehen/Unnd sie eine uber= meßige Proviant bey sich haben sollen/dann jhr Land über die massen fruchtbar sein solle/Sie sollen auch bey jnen vil trefflicher Künstler ha= ben/zü unbekandtem Fewerwerck/die das fewr ko'nnen machen in die ho'he brennen/gleich so es vom Himmel Kα'rne/das sollen sie aber mit Zau= berey thūn/Und sollen disse Rote Juden die sein/ davon in den Historien geschrieben steht/das der grosse Alexander innerhalb des Gebirges Ca= spiß ein neuß Geschlecht der Juden nach jm ge= lassen habe/die das Kalb und die Schlange an= gebettet haben/sich die zeit her in solchen Gebir= gen der massen zusamen gehalten/das man nicht von jnen gehō'rt/auch niemand hat zu jnen kom= men ko'nnen/von wegen des Sandes am Meer/so man das Sandechtig Meer nennet. Ire spra= che soll Passart oder corrumpiert Hebräisch sein/Und sagen die Juden eine Prophecey/davon sie sagen/das im Propheten Daniel steht/Wie er sagt von dem vierdten theyl der Welt/der wer= de sich empō'ren/Und will der Messias kommen und die welt herschen werde/aber was das ist/

verstehe ich nicht/doch soll jre macht erschrecken= lich sein/und ungleublich/Und stehet der Türck gegen jnen in grosser gefahr/denn sie sollen nicht auff die Türckische Grentze kommen sein/und ist jhr fürhaben stracks auffs gelobte land zu zie= hen/Welchs sie das Land der verheyssung nen= nen/der meynung/jr reich/das ist/das Ju= denthumb widerumb auffzürchten.
Datum Constantinopel/Anno
M.D.LXII.
Translation:

[fol. a i'd]
[1] News of the great army of red Jews who have come forth in Asia from the Caspian Mountains. These Jews say they are descended from the six tribes of Israel, as you will hear in the following.

[10] Recently written from Constantinople in this 1562nd year.

[fol. a ii']
[1] News of the great army of Red Jews who have come forth out of the Caspian Mountains. These Red Jews say they are descended from the six tribes of Israel, namely from the tribe of Reuben, the tribe of Gad, the tribe of Asher, the tribe of Issachar, the tribe of Zebulon, the tribe of Manasseh, and each tribe has a chief and its own banner. They march with a great army, and their chiefs are as follows.

The chief in charge of the troops of the tribe of Reuben is the supreme commander of the entire army, he is a savage and wild man, and is called Ilian. He has under him two thousand men protected by chain mail, armed with fighting shields and long broadswords, and clothed in silk. Their banner is black and grey, and depicts a dog chasing a hart, and on it is written in their language Dead

---

8. Whether ten or six or seven-and-a-half tribes are named, the Ten Tribes are generally meant. The differences are based on varying interpretations of the Biblical passages concerning the exiles of the Israelites.
or alive.

The chief in charge of the troops of the tribe of Gad is called Jonas. He commands seven thousand horsemen on whose banner is a falcon biting the hilt of a sword (?) with these words: You or I must break.

The chief in charge of the troops of Asher is called Galleson and claims to be a Jewish margrave, and commands fifteen thousand horsemen and seventeen thousand infantrymen. They have a red banner depicting a maiden in a green dress, with a lion standing before her, with the words: I hope to tame that which is wild.

The chief in charge of the troops from the tribe of Issachar styles himself the Count of Allar. He commands twenty thousand horsemen, of which four thousand are mounted crossbowmen. On their battle flag there is a man in [or: holding?] chains with the words: My chains will bind others.

The chief in charge of the troops of the tribe of Zebulon is called Athan and styles himself Duke Persolda. He commands fifteen thousand sharpshooters. They have a blue banner on which is a withered tree, with the words: I will try to become green once again.

The chief in charge of the troops from the tribe of Manasseh is called Gisar and styles himself Margrave of Vorrey. He commands twelve thousand footsoldiers in impenetrable leather armour. They have a green banner depicting an old man in slippers, with the words: I still hope to expect much.

This has all been written down by the Turkish Paschas that the Turk has on his borders. The Jews here in Constantinople and elsewhere in this land are secretly extremely pleased by this news.
[15] And although no-one else has been able to get to this people [the Red Jews], the Jews have always had secret relations with them. And in addition to the six tribes, there is said to be a great horde of common folk both mounted and on foot marching with them. They are said to have an unusually large amount of provisions with them, as their country is said to be exceptionally fruitful. They are also said to have many excellent artisans with them, skilled in unknown fire-works, who can make fires burn in the sky as though the fire came from heaven. But this they are said to do by means of the magic arts. And these Red Jews are said to be those concerning whom the Histories relate that Alexander the Great left behind him in the Caspian Mountains a new people of Jews, who had worshipped the [golden] calf and the snake, and since then stayed together in those mountains so closely that no-one has heard of them since, nor could anyone reach them, on account of the sand in the sea called the Sandy Sea. Their language is said to be bastard or corrupt Hebrew. The Jews have a prophecy, concerning which they say that the prophet Daniel speaks of the fourth part or corner of the world. This part will rise up, and the Messiah will come and rule the world, but what this is, I do not understand, yet their might is said to be appalling and unbelievable. The Turk is greatly threatened by them, as they are said not to have come to the Turkish border, but their intent is to go straight to the Holy Land, which they call the Promised Land, with the plan of refounding their kingdom, that is Jewry.

Dated at Constantinople in the year M.D.LXII.
20. Konrad Memmius, Calendarii Historici // Relatio, 1595:

Iunius ANNO 1595

1 Der Bolnische Adel wider die Tartarn aufgemahnet

Den ledsten Monats tag May / hat man zu Cracaw umgeschlagen / vnd den Polnischen Adel zum dritten / in Anzug wider die Tartarn aufgemahnet / welche mit unzählichem hauffen vnd grausamer Macht / durchbrechen wollen / bey welchen auch 40000 Turcken oder Roten Juden befunden. [...]

Translation:

[1] The Polish nobility is called to arms against the Tartars

On the last day of the month of May, a public announcement was made in Cracow with beating of drums, and the Polish nobility was called upon for the third time to take arms and march against the Tartars, who with an innumerable horde and horrible force wish to break out; they have with them 40000 Turks or Red Jews.

---

21. The wartime pamphlets of 1596:

a) Weller 825

[pag 1]

1 Zwo warhafftige new Zeittung / Die Erste / Aus Venedig
dis 1596. Jarz / den dritten Junij Wie drey Legion rothe Jüden / auß dem Gebirg Caspis / hinder dem rothen Meer / jetzundt gerüst herfür kommen / Welche Keyser Alexander Magnus hinder sich im Gebirg verschlossen gelassen hat / die wollen mit Heeres krafft Jerusalem / und das gantze Jüdische Land wider gewinnen vnd eimmnemen. In gesangweiß
gestellet / Im Thon:

Störtzenbecher vnd Gödische Michael.

Die andern Zeittung.
Wie durch Gottes Hülf / der grosse
Fürst auß Siebenbürgen ein gewaltige Schlacht mit den Türcken gethan / darinnen acht Wascha gewesen / deren zween gefangen / vnd drey erschossen worden sind
Auch wie der Siebenbürgen jnen 90. Chamel / 30. Maulesel/
vnter welchen die heilige geweihte Fahne des Türckischen Mahometi gewesen ist / Auch wie er dem Türcken hat 50. Tausent Mann erlegt / Dargegen auch 18 Tausent Christen todt blieben / doch mit hülf des

[1505-1599] (Tübingen, 1872; =BLVS, 111); 350, numbers 824 and 825. The originals, at the former Royal Library (Deutsche Staats-bibliothek), Berlin were destroyed or lost during the second World War. However, both were transcribed (and thus saved) by Heinrich Loewe in a privately published booklet entitled Zur Kunde von den Juden im Kaukasus aus zwei alten deutschen Zeitungen (Charlottenberg, 1900), 16-22. I have called the pages 'page' as there is no extant copy that would provide exact pagination. Since there is no copy against which to check the division of lines, I have retained the original divisions as reported by Loewe, even though format considerations force the wrapping of lines when a single line will not fit within the margins.
Allmechtigen das Feld behalten. Geschehen diß 96 Jahr.

Im thon wie man die tagweis singt

Die Erste Zeittung.

Hoert zu ihr Christen alle zugleich / ihr seit gleich Jung / Arm / oder reich davon ich euch wil singen / von Gottes Wunderwerck so groß / von newgeschehen Dingen.

Als man zehlt fünfftzehen hundert Jar / Sechs vnd Neunt zig das ist war / vbrs rothe Meer ist kommen / gen Venedig ein Kaufherr gut / der Rat hats bald vernomen. Er bracht seltzam newe Zeittung her / von rothen Jüden vber Meer / welche vor langen Zeiten / Im Gebirg Caspis verschlossen sein / die wollen hefftig streiten. Sie haben sich gerüstet bald / Auff den Türcken mit gantz gewalt / vber Caspis gezogen / Hört was ich euch jetzt singen wil / ist war vnd nicht erlogen.

Die Jüden mit jhrem hauffen bald / zogen vber das Gebirg mit gantz gewaldt / sie woltens Ritterlich wagen/ Sie wolten die Türcken mit gantz gewalt / auß dem Jüdischen Lande jagen Keyser Alexander Magnus / solche Jüden in das Gebirg verschluß / sie haben sich [sehr] sehr gemehret / Drey Legion ist jhr in der Summ / wie jhr vor habt gehöret. Der Oberste jhr König groß / von Persich Solde⁴¹ vnd sein Genoß / fürst neunmal hundert tausent Mane / die sint all in hart Leder bekleidt / und füren in jrer Fane[,] Ein Jungfraw vnd ein Windspiel drot / Ihr Reim heist Lebendig oder todt / Bogen vnd Pfeil sie führen / Wollen den Streit nicht lassen ab diesen jhren Feind berühren. Der ander Oberste allda / ein König auß Joponia / vber ⁴¹. Cf. the 1562 pamphlet, "the Duke of Persolda".

das rothe Jüdisch Heere / ein gantze Legio(n) gerüst / auf Jopenisch manire.
Der Vierde auch in seiner Fahn / führet ein alten Eiß grawen Man / mit Keten groß zu binden / biß er zu Jerusalem sein Feind möcht vberwinden.
Auß Caria der Fünffte Fürst / nach dem in diesem Lande rüst / vber hundert Tausent mehre Die sind in rothe Seyden
beckleidt / mit Timorischen Wehren.
Ihr rothe Fahn mit jrrdem Topff / ein grüner Adler sieht daruff / Der Reim thut also sprechen. Entweder ich oder du / 20 wir beide müssen brechen.
Parthel / Chamel sie mit sich han / Ihr Leuffer sind auß
Midian / sind alles leichte Pferde

1 Pferde / Panther Thier
führen sie mit / sind allen Menschen sehr gefehre.
Gott weiß was dieser Zug bedeust / das wissen wenig Christenleut / von diesen rothen Jüden / die hinder dem rothen
5 Meer herkomen / den Türcken zu keinem guten.
Gott woll dem Türcken widerstandt thun / mit den rothen Jüden zu spot un(d) hon / Darumb jhr lieben Christen / bittet
Götte umb sein Gnad / er wöl unser leben fristen.
Vnd auch jhr Christen alle durch Gott / bittet fleissig
vmb
10 sein Genad / das er die straff gnedig abwende / das wir Nach
dieser mühseligen Zeit / erlangen ein seliges Ende.
Gedruckt zu Wien in Oesterreich bey Leonhart Nossinger.
Translation:

a) Weller 825

Two true reports.
The first, from Venice, in this year 1596, the third of June. How three legions of Red Jews, from the Caspian Mountains, behind the Red Sea, have now come out all armed, whom [the Red Jews] Emperor Alexander the Great left behind him enclosed in the mountains. They want to conquer Jerusalem and the all the Jewish lands with military might. Put to music for singing, to the tune of Störtebecker and Gödeke Michels.\(^\text{12}\)

The other report.
How the great Prince from Siebenbürgen with God’s help fought a great battle with the Turks, in which there were eight pashas, of whom two were captured and three shot down. Also, how the forces of Siebenbürgen took 90 camels, 30 mules and 50 Turkish banners, one of which was a holy consecrated flag of the Turkish Mohammed. Also how he cut down 50 thousand Turkish soldiers, while 18 thousand Christians fell, but with the help of Almighty God they won the battle. [This] happened this 96th year.

---

\(^\text{12}\) A popular tune of some antiquity: Loewe notes P. Fabricius, Liederbuch, 1603, no. 183; and Ludwig Erk and Franz Böhme, Deutscher Liederhort (1893), II, 19, no. 233, which includes the notes. Klaus Störtebecker and his associate Gödeke Michels got their start running provisions through the blockade of Stockholm (as 'Vitalienbrüder'; 1389-95), but later turned to piracy, concentrating on the ships of the powerful Hanse, in the North Sea. Störtebecker was executed in 1402. He became a folk hero, and the song celebrating him was composed the year of his execution: Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, vol. 36 (Berlin, 1971/reprint of 1893 edition), 459-460.
To the tune of a morning song.\footnote{A tagweis or tagelied is a song sung by lovers as they part at dawn, or simply to greet the day. What this instruction means is unclear, as the tune has been announced; it may concern the style of singing.}

The first report.

Listen now you Christians, young, poor or rich, I will sing to you of God’s great miracles, that came to pass recently. When we reckoned the year 1596, an honest merchant came from across the Red Sea to Venice, and told the city council this tale. He brought wondrous news of Red Jews beyond the sea, who were enclosed long ago in the Caspian Mountains, and who intend to take up arms for a bitter battle. They have armed themselves and have marched in all their might against the Turk, across the Caspian Mountains. Hear now what I sing you, for it is true, no trumped-up tale.

The Jews and their bold troops marched over the mountains arrayed in all their might, to take a stand in chivalrous fashion. They wanted to drive the Turks out of the Jewish lands with all their might. Emperor Alexander the Great enclosed these Jews in the mountains. They have multiplied greatly. They are three legions in total, as you have already heard. The commander, their great king, from Persich Solde\footnote{Cf. ‘the Duke of Persolda’, Weller 825; or maybe this means from [the] Persian [town of] Solda.} with his companions, prince of nine hundred times a thousand men, who are all clothed in tough leather, and have on their banner a maiden and a swift coursing hound; their rhyme is ‘dead or alive’; they are armed with bows and arrows, and do not wish to cease fighting and attacking this their enemy.

The other commander there, a king from Joponia,\footnote{Japan!} in charge of the Red Jewish army, has a whole legion armed in the Joponian manner. The fourth also has on his banner a grizzled old man holding great chains to bind with, until he is able to overcome his enemy at Jerusalem.

[15] The fifth prince comes from Caria and has armed five thousand more in this land. They are clothed in red silk, and armed with Timorese weapons.

[On] their banner, which is red with an earthenware pot, and a green eagle looking at it, the rhyme goes like this: Either you or I,

[20] we must both break."

They have leopards and camels with them. Their runners are from Midian, and are all light horsemen.

[page 4]

[1] They have panthers with them and pose a serious danger to everyone.

God (alone) knows what this expedition means. Few Christians know about these Red Jews who come from behind the Red Sea, and pose a great threat to the Turks.

And you Christians all ask diligently for his grace, that he always mercifully avert the [just] punishment, so that we can come to a blessed end after surviving these trying times.

Printed at Vienna in Austria, by Leonhart Nossinger.

". Cf. 1562, "Either you or I: one of us must break."
b) Weller 824\textsuperscript{67}

1 Zwe warhaffte wunder seltzame neue Zeitung Die Erste:

Wie hundert mal tausend / vnd
5 sechs vnd neuntzig tausent Juden / nemlich das Geschlecht Roboam\textsuperscript{68} / Gad / Asar / Isaac / Sabulon / vnd Manasses vom Berg Caspin / dem Türkchen in das Landt gefallen / vnd viel feste Stätt vnd Schlosser eingenommen haben / auß Venedig / Rom / Constantinopel / im Julio vnd Augusto deß 96 Jars warhafftig geschrieben / Lieder weiß gestellet: Im Thon: Pomey / Pomey jhr Polen / etc.

Die Ander:

Von einer erschrecklichen Mörder Ge-15 schicht / zu Leukh im Wallißland\textsuperscript{69} den 26. Augusti dieses 96. Jahres verlauffen: Im Thon: Insbruck ich muß dich laßen / etc.

Gedruckt zu Lindaw am Bo-
20 densee / bey Hans Ludwig Brem /

[page 2]

1 LObe Gott deinen HErren / O werde Christenheit / der mit gwalt thut zerstören / der Türkchen Grimmigkeit / der so viel Jahr vnd Tag / mit mancher schweren Plag / uns Christen
hat verfolget / hört Wunder was ich sag.
5 Als der Türk hat vernommen / wie das die Christenheit/

\textsuperscript{67}. Loewe, \textit{Juden im Kaukasus}, 19-22. I place this pamphlet, Weller 824, second, as it mentions as its sources reports that reached the west in July and August; however, it is closer to the 1562 pamphlets, the common source for these two later publications.

\textsuperscript{68}. Reuben, to judge by the 1562 pamphlet; a confusion with Rehobeam?

\textsuperscript{69}. Flemish 'Luik', French Lièg.
sey uberein gekommen / vnd geschworen einen Eid / die Tribut also schwer / jm zgeben nimmermer / Leib / Gut / Blut darfür zwagen / ist er erzürnet sehr.
Hat bald ein List errichtet / in seinem Ubermut / groß Schatzung aufgerichtet / geschunden der Armen Blut / sein eigen Volck daran / einen Unwill bekam / altem Brauch kurtzumb zieben / bei Machomet schwur jedermann.
Ob der Türcken Vorhaben / der groß Keyser Sultan / heimlich Verdruss thet tragen / doch stifft er weiter an / weil jm jetzt diese Schantz gefehlet habe gantz / einen Krebßgang gewonnen Practick fand er auff einen glantz.
Schickt bald seine Legaten / in das wüst gBirg Caspin den Juden da zu rahten / erlegen Schatzung bhend / damit der groß Türck gut / möchte uben seinen Mut / sein grimmig Hertz erkülen / an der Christen vnschuldig Blut.
Als bald gemeldte Gesandten / jr Fürtrag hetten than / die Juden sie vmbrandten / erstachens bey eim Mann / bschlossend kräftig hierauf / mit ganztem hellem hauff / das Glothlandt einzunemen / wacker vnd munter schlagen drauff.
Lerman Lerman hort man singen / im gantzen Land herumb / die Juden theten springen / waren toll / wild vnd thumb / ein jeder unter jm / wolte der gröst Han seyn / das künftig Glück erschnappen / in zugsagt von der Welt anbegr. Sechs hauffen waren erwehlet / der erst vom Geschlecht³⁰
[Ruben / (led by) ein Oberster General über das gantze Heer / ]

³⁰ Loewe notes that the catchword has been cut off, but by comparison to the 1562 pamphlet, we see that an entire line is missing; I therefore supply the corresponding line from the 1562 version.
tausendt Pferd auffs gringste / in Küriß all angethan.
Mit seiden Gwandt gezieret / ihr Fahnen graw unnd schwartz / in diesem thut er führen / ein Hund so in eim hatz / ein Hirsch nachfolget bhend / mit Goldt geschrieben sind/ nach folgende Buchstaben : Todt odr aber lebendig.
Das ander Geschlecht Gad führet / ein Feldherr Joran gnandt / dieser thut auch regieren / zwantzig tausent Pferd erkanndt im Fahnen gmahlet ist / ein Falck zu dieser frist / mit Goldt steht da geschrieben / du oder ich muß brechen sich.
Das dritt uhralt Geschlecht Asar / ein Marggraff hochgeborn / der Juden heist Belsazar / hatt vnnder seinem Sporn /
fünff vnd viertzig tausendt Pferd / zu Fuß sieben vnd zwantzig tausendt gmeht / ein Jungfraw lang bekleidet / im Fahnen steht gantz unverseert Das Volck Isaac¹ regiert / ein Graff von Altz lobsam/ der hat sein Fahn gzieret / mit zwantzig tausendt Mann / mit Armbrüsten zu Rossz / oln den verlornten Trossz / ein Held mit einer Ketten / führt er mit seinen armen bloß.
In sein Fahn sicht man qplantzen / in Gold auffgezeichnet

¹. Misreading or misunderstanding of Issachar.
Pferd mit Bogen frey / führt Pflitsch-

Dar an geschrieben wirdt gefunden / mit rotem Goldt subtill/Ich dürrrer Baum zur stunden / wils Gott ich grünen wil/diesem
zur seiten recht / führet Manasses geschlecht / ein Marggraaff von
Noaren / zwey vnd viertzig tausendt Fußknecht.
Bekleidt mit Leder schöne / kein Mensch durchstechen kan/führet ein grüne Fahnen / darinn ein grawen Mann / der hat Pantoffeln an / diese wort sind im Fahn / ich hab noch viel zu
erwarten / Leib vnd Leben setz ich daran.
Ist das nicht ein groß wunder / o frommer Christ vermerck / daß die Juden jetztzunder / gericht haben ins Werck / vmb Constantinopel hrumb / der Juden ein mercklich summ / sich täglich zu jn schlahend / wollen das Globtlandt han kurtzumb.
Ein überfluß mit jnen / habens bracht in das Land / damit
in nichts zerrinne / an allerley Proviant / ir Edel Lande gar / ist uberaus fruchtbart / Feuerwerck so vier stund brinnet / werffen
sie in die Feste dar.
Es wirt auch fürwar gschrieben / das rote wilde Meer / sey ein Monat still blieben biß das ihr gantz Kriegsheer/herüber kommen sey / Gotts gwalt nimb ab hierbey / dem allein ist wissen / was das für ein werck müß seyn.
Christus und die Propheten / habn uns vorlangst verkünd/wie daß der Machomete / mit sampt der juden Gesind / der Christen Glauben zwar / sollen annemmen gar / ein Hirt Schaffstall werden / vom jüngsten Tag sagt die Gschrift klar.
O Jesu lieber Herre / deß Türcken gwalt zerstör / den

Loewe notes that the verse ends here; the last line and the catchword have been cut off.
Christen Glauben mehre / die Juden zu dir bekehr / gib fried und Einigkeit / bhüt vns vor allem Leid / dein Nam ist allein
heilig / hie vnd dort in all Ewigkeit / Amen.
Two true and marvelous reports. The first:

How one hundred times a thousand and ninety-six thousand Jews, namely the tribes Roboam [Reuben], Gad, Asar [Asher], Isaac [Issachar], Sabulon [Zebulon], and Manasses [Manasseh] have attacked the land of the Turks from out of Mount Caspin, and have conquered many fortified cities and castles, truly written from Venice, Rome and Constantinople in July and August of the 96th year, and put to music, in the tune of "Pomey, Pomey, ihr Polen, etc." The second:

Concerning the horrible story of a murder that happened at Liège in Wallonia on the 26th of August, in this 96th year, to the tune "Innsbruck ich müß dich lassen, etc."

Printed at Lindau on Lake Constance, by Hans Ludwig Brem.

Praise God your Lord, o worthy Christendom, whose might destroys Turkish cruelty, which has tormented us Christians for so long now with many grave assaults, now hear my wondrous tidings! When the [Great] Turk heard that Christendom had agreed, and sworn an oath, not to pay him the heavy tribute anymore, and to risk body, goods and blood for this, he was greatly angered. He soon came up with a cunning ruse, in his arrogance, and levied a huge tax, sucking the blood of the poor, such that his own subjects no longer wished to live merely according to their old customs, and everyone swore by Mohammed. The great Emperor and Sultan was greatly displeased in his own mind by the opinion of the Turks, but he provoked them further, because he had never had so good an opportunity, so he 'went backwards'\textsuperscript{7} and came up with a very clever stratagem. He sent his legates swiftly to the wild mountains of Caspin, to order the Jews there to pay their tax quickly, so that the good Great Turk could vent his spleen and cool his raging heart with innocent Christian blood. When these legates had said their piece, the Jews surrounded them and stabbed them all, to a man, and on the strength of this deed, took a firm decision to conquer the Promised Land, and to attack [their enemies] heartily and in a lively fashion.

\textsuperscript{20} 'Lerman, Lerman' they sang, all through the land. The Jews jumped for joy, they were wild and crazy with joy. They all of them wanted to be the cock of the walk and grab their future happiness, promised to them since the world began. Six great bands of men were chosen, the first from the tribe [of Reuben, led by a general over the entire army.

\textsuperscript{[page 3]}

\textsuperscript{1} He is a wild and fearless man, who in one month easily gathered twenty thousand horsemen all armed in cuirasses. Their banner is adorned with silk cloth, in grey and black, and on it is depicted a hound, hunting,

\textsuperscript{5} pursuing a hart swiftly, and written in gold are these letters: Dead or alive. The second tribe, Gad, is led by a general called Joran, who also commands twenty thousand horsemen. On their banner is painted a falcon, and \textsuperscript{10} in gold is written: You or I must break. The third ancient tribe, Asar [Asher], a high-born margrave of the Jews called Belsazar, who commands forty-five thousand horse, supported by twenty-seven thousand foot. On their banner is a maiden in a long dress, untouched by a lion before her with its mouth wide open, and written there for all to read: Everything must go to bits / But in quiet moments I hope / I plan to tame the beast / soon there will be a spectacle passing strange.

\textsuperscript{15} The people of Isaac [Issachar] is ruled by the worthy Count of Altz. His banner is supported by twenty thousand mounted crossbowmen not counting the lost baggage train. A hero with a chain he holds with his bare arms. On his banner, worked finely in gold, shine forth the words: I

\textsuperscript{20} risk everything on the occasion / it must be attempted/

\textsuperscript{7} "Kreb\ss gang gewinnen", according to Alfred Gütze's \textit{Frühneuhochdeutsches Glossar} (Berlin 1967'), 141, means "to go backwards" straight off I'll bind the Turkish dog with my chains / from now on will I happily / ally myself with the Christians. The general in command of the tribe of Sabulon [Zebulon] is called Athan, a grand duke of Berseban [Beersheba?], he [leads] fifteen thousand horsemen armed with bows [the following fragment is obscure].

[page 4]

[1] On it is written in fine red gold: I will green the wizened tree, so God will, immediately; on the right side of this, the tribe of Manasses [Manasseh] is led by a Margrave of Noara, with forty-two thousand footsoldiers.

[5] Clothed in good leather that no man can pierce. He has a green banner, depicting a greybeard in slippers, and these words are on the banner: I still have much to hope for / I risk my body and my life for it. Is it not a great wonder, o pious Christian, take note, that the Jews have now arrayed around Constantinople a large host of Jews who attack the Turks daily, and wish to conquer the Promised Land next? They brought a great surplus with them on campaign, so that they should lack for nothing. Their marvelous land is exceedingly rich in all varieties of foodstuffs. They cast into that fortress fire-works that burn for four hours. It is also written that the wild Red Sea stood still for a month, until their entire army had passed through it. Take note of God’s power from this instance. He alone knows what this deed signifies. Christ and the prophets announced to us long ago that the Mohammedan[s] and the Jewish rabble will take on the Christian faith entirely, and there will be one shepherd and one sheepfold. Scripture tells clearly about the Last Day [Doomsday].

[25] O Jesus, dear Lord, break the might of the Turks, increase the Christian faith, convert the Jews, give peace and good accord, save us from all suffering. Your name alone is holy, on earth as in heaven for ever and ever. Amen. 3

4 The Red Sea is here conflated with the Sambation/Sabbation.

7. This touchingly naive paraphrase of the Lord’s Prayer provides us with a striking bridge between the theatre of secular war and the eschatological drama of God’s final battle.
APPENDIX B: THE ‘UNCLEAN NATIONS’, GOG AND MAGOG, AND THE TEN TRIBES

1. Commodiani Carmina (before 312 C.E.), ed. Joseph Martin:

Desidet <populus> absconsus ultimus sanctus,
Et quidem ignotus a nobis ubi moretur.

Per novem tribum agant et dimidiam ipsi,
Omissae duae tribum haec sunt et dimidia nobis.

Praecipitque Christus per legem vivere priscos.
Vivamus nunc ommes, novellae traditio legis,
Lex ut ipsa docet! Apertius indico vobis.
Obrelictiae duae tribum et dimidia : quare

Ab istis dimidia tribum? Ut martyres essent, Bellum cum inferret et electis suis in orbem,
Seu certe sanctorum chorus prophetarum ad illam
Consurgeret plebem, qui frenum imponeret illis, Obsceni quos equi trucidarunt calci remissa;
Nee suerit ad manus pacem aliquando tenere.

Somotae sunt isti tribuum, ut mysteria Christi
Omnia per istas compleatur saeculo toto.

Sunt autem de scelere duorum fratrum enatae,
Auspicio quorum facinus secutae fuere.
Non merito tales dispersi sunt?

Conveniunt iterum propter mysteria castris.
Tunc autem properant completeri legis narrata.
Omnipotens Christus descendit ad suos electos,

Obscurati nobis qui fuerunt tempore tanto,
Milia fut [tot] facti; illa est gens vera caelestis.

Non natus ante patrem moritur ibi, neque dolores
In suis corporibus sentiunt ut ulcera nata.
Pausantes in lecto suo mature recedunt
Omnia complelentes leges, ideoque tutantur.

Exsiccet fluvium quibus sicut ante traiectis,
Nec minus et Dominus ipse producit cum illis.
Transit ad nostra, veniant cum rege caeleste.
In quorum itinere quod dicam, quo Deus educet,
Subsidunt montes ante illos et fontes erumpunt:

Caelestem populum gaudet creatura videre.

---

1. Commodiani Carmina, Instructionum liber I, cap. xliii, "De populo absconso sancto omnipotenti Christi Dei "vivi" CChr CXXVIII.34ff.
Hic tamen festinant matre defendere capta [Jerusalem].
Rex autem iniquus [Antichrist], qui obtinet, illum ut audit,
In partem boreae refugit et colligit omnes.
Sed cum se inlidet exercitu Dei tyrannus,
Terrore caelesti prostrernuntur milites eius,
Ipse cum infando comprehenditur pseudopropheta;
Decreto Domini traduntur vivi gehennae.

2. Anderson cites a different passage, from the Carmen apologeticum, vv. 932-939:

1 Et clamant pariter ad caelum voce deflentes,
Ut Deus illis subveniat verus ab alto.
Tum Deus omnipotens, ut terminet cuncta, quae dixi, Producet populum celatum tempore multo:
5 Sunt autem Iudaei, trans Persida flumine clausi,
Quos usque in finem voluit Deus ibi morari.
Captivitas illos ibidem redigit ut essent,
Ex duodena tribu nove semis ibi morantur. (60-61)

\[. Alexander's Gate, 60-61.\]
3. Ambrose, De Fide ad Gratianum:¹

1 Gog iste Gothus est, quem iam videmus exisse, de quo promittitur nobis futura victoria, dicente Domino: 'Et depraedabuntur eos qui depraedati eos fuerant, et despoliabunt eos qui sibi spolia detraxerant, dicit Dominus. Eritque in die illa, dabo Gog (hoc est, Gothis) locum nominatum, monumentum Israel multorum virorum congestum, qui supervenerunt ad mare; et per circuitum struet os vallis, et obruet illic Gog et totam multitudinem eius..."
4. Jerome, Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim:

Scio quendam Gog et Magog tam de praesenti loco quam de Exechiel ad Gothorum nuper in terra nostra vagantum historiam retulisse: quod utrum verum sit, proelii ipsius fine monstratur. Et certe Gothos omnes retro eruditi magis Getas quam Gog et Magog appellare consuerant.

5. Jerome, Commentariorum in Hiezechielem libri XIV:

Undecimus in Hiezechielem explanationum in extrema sua parte contra Gog et Magog vaticinium continebit et usque ad exordium civitatis in monte positae et templi in ea siti veniet Hierusalem. Quem si, adiuvante Domino et sua mysteria disserente, potuero ad calcem usque perduere, diu mihi erit multumque dubitantem, utrum ad spiritale tempulum debeat mittere manus an aperte ignorantiam confiteri, praesertim cum et apud Iudaeos et apud nos super interpretationem eius grande silentium sit, alii in futuro tempore exstruendum esse censentibus, alii bono quidem animo, sed imperito, scientibus spiritualia esse quae dicuntur et tamen ipsa spiritualia, quomodo disseri debeant, nescientibus. Et interim, ut praesentis operis cura nos teneat, et scias, [sic: virgine] Christi Eustochium, orandum tibi esse pro nobis. In prophetia (15) difficillima illud breviter admonebo, quod vir nostrae aetatis haud ignobilis, ad imperatorem scribens, super hac natione dixerit: Gog iste Gothus est, cui qua ratione possint omnia quae in ea scripta sunt coaptari, non est meum sed eorum qui hoc putant disserere.

---

1. Gen. 10,2; CChr LXXII.11, 18-22; PL XXIII.351.
2. Ez. 11; CChr LXXV.480, 1-19; PL XXV.325-326.
5. Ambrose, De fide ad Gratianum, ii. 16; 138; PL XVI, 511-512.
6. Jerome, Commentariorum in Hiezekielem libri XIV.

1 [1476]... Igitur Iudaei et nostri iudaizantes putant Gog gentes esse Scythicas immanes et innumerabiles quae trans Caucasum montem et Maeotim paludem et propter Caspium mare ad Indian usque tendantur [1480]-- et has post mille annorum regnum esse a diabolo commovendas --, quae veniant in terram Israel ut pugnent contra sanctos, multis secum gentibus congregatis: primum Mosoch quos Iosephus interpretatur Cappadoce; dein Thubal quos idem Iberos vel Hispanos, Hebraei Italos suspecat-[1485] tur, habentes secum in exercitu Persas, Aethiopes et Libyas; Gomer quoque et Thogorma quos Galatas et Phrygas interpretatur; Sabaeos quoque et Dedan et Carthaginenses sive Tharsis; et hoc esse, quod Ioannes quoque in sua pontit Apocalypsi [Rev. 20,7]: "Et cum finiti fuerint mille anni, solvetur Sata-[1490] nas de custodia sua, ut seducat gentes in quattuor angulis terrae, Gog et Magog, ut congreget eos ad bellum: quorum numerus est sicut arena maris. Et ascendenter per latitudinem terrae, et circumdederunt castra sanctorum et civitatem dilectam. Et descendit ignis a Deo de caelo, et devoravit eos; et [1495] diabolus qui seducebat eos missus est in stagnum ignis et noctibus in saecula saeculorum," non intelligentes [sc. Iudei et iudaizantes] totum volumen Ioann.[s; quod Revelationis titulo 25 praenotatur, esse mysticum, et revelatione nos indique ut possimur cum propheta [1500] dicere: Reveala oculos meos, et considerabo mirabilia de lege tua. Alli vero terrenum sensum relinquentes et iudaicas atque aniles fabulas quae noxiae sunt, et aquiescentes sibi detrahunt in profundum, nimium ad alta conscendunt et multo peiores fingunt nenias, ut in cælesti Hierusalem diaboli et [1505] omnis exercitus eius bella describant et sub etymologia gentium singularum interpretentur spiritualia nequitiae in caelestibus. Quae nos omnia lectoris arbitrio concedentes, non tam aliena damnare quam ecclesiasticam explanationem affirmare conabimur. 'Gog' graeco sermone doma, latino 'tec-[1510] tum' dicitur; porro 'Magog' interpretatur 'de tecto' -- omnis igitur superbia et falsi nominis scientia quae erigit se contra notitiam veritatis, his nominibus demonstratur.

---

1. Ez. 11, 38,1-23; CChr LXXV.525, 1476-1490; and 526. 1501 - 527, 1512.
7. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, XX, ch. 11:

1 Gentes quippe istae, quas appellat Gog et Magog, non sic sunt accipiendae, tamquam sint aliqui in aliqua parte terrarum barbari constituti, sive quos quidam [sc. Hieronymus] suspicantur Getas et Massagetas propter litteras horum nominum primas, sive alios alienigenas et a Romano iure seiiunctos.

5 Toto namque orbe terrarum significati sunt isti esse, cum dictum est 'nationes quae sunt in quattuor angulis terrae', easque subiecit esse 'Gog et Magog'.

---

9. CChr LXVIII; PL XLI.676.

10. This accusation (that Jerome suspected Gog and Magog to be the Getas and Massagetas because they shared the first initials of their names) does not fit with Jerome's rejection of this interpretation in his Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim; see text 4, above.
Concerning Gog and Magog:

1 Tunc exsurgent ab Aquilone spurcissimae gentes, quas Alexander rex inclusit in Goch et Magoch. Haec sunt viginti duo regna, quorum numerus est sicut arena maris. Quod cum audierit Romanorum rex, convocato exercitu debellabit eos et prosternet eos usque ad internecionem. Hic semper habebit prae oculis Scripturam ita dicentem: Rex Romanorum omne sibi vindicet regnum terrarum. Omnes ergo insulas et civitates devastabit, et universa idolorum templ a destruct, et omnes paganos ad baptismum convocabit, et per omnia templo crux Christi erigetur: Judaei etiam tunc convertentur ad Dominum.

---

2. PL CI (in second volume of Alcuin’s works), 1289ff.
3. PL CI.1296b.
4. Here both Gog and Magog are a country or place, as Magog is in Ezekiel 38.
9. Honorius Augustodunensis (+1130):\(^{15}\)

1 In India est mons Caspia, a quo Caspium mare vocatur. Inter quem et mare Gog et Magog ferocissimae gentes, a magno Alexandro inclusae feruntur. Quae humanis carnibus vel caudis bestiis vescuntur.

10. Lucidarius (12th century):\(^{16}\)

1 In India ist ein berc der heizet Caspius, da von heizet daz Speniche mer. zwissent dem mer unde dem berge, vermurte der kunic Alexander zueiger slaste lút, die hezent Goc unde Magoc. die lúte ascent nith wen rowe tier unde menschen fleisch.

Translation:

[1] In India is a mountain called Caspius, after which is named the Spanish Sea. Between the sea and this mountain, king Alexander walled up two nations, called Gog and Magog. These people eat nothing but raw \(^{15}\) De imagine mundi libri tres, PL CLXXII.123d: ch. XI, "de India". This brief passage appears in the midst of a description of the monstrous and fabulous peoples of 'India', including the pygmies and the cranes, the macrobios and the griffons, people who eat their aged parents, dog-headed people, monoculi, cyclopses, people with one foot, which they use for shade, people whose face is in their chest, people who live on the odor of apples, etc.

\(^{16}\) This 12th-century German work was often copied, then printed in the 14th and 15th centuries. Its main source is Honorius' Imago mundi: ed. Felix Heidlauf (Weidmann, 1970\(^{2}\); = Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, 28), 10,27 - 11,3.
11. Lamprecht’s Alexander (c. 1130): 17

Allexander ward kunt getan, zwie geslechtte sessen in Paran, die fügten der weltte gros not, manig helt geleg von in dot und weren niut güt nach gebur. mangen ward ir leben sur: wa si namen über hang wib und kind slûgen sy ze hant; Og und Magog waren sy genant. Allexander zoch dar mit einer krefftiger schar und betwang sy sunder dank und treib sy an allen wank in ein gebirge gros, daz an die Pigine stost, an daz wiettende mer, da vermuret er daz selb her: er treibs durch ein enges tall, da der weg was smal, ein mur von einem berge unz an den andren zoch gelich den bergen hoch und besaczt mit gütter wer. danach zoch er mit sinem her.

17. Die Basler Bearbeitung von Lamprechts Alexander, ed. Richard Maria Werner (Tübingen, 1881; = BLVS, 154), from the fifteenth-century manuscript in the University Library at Basel, E VI 26; this passage is on pages 186-187 of Werner’s edition. See also the edition of Karl Kinzel, Lamprechts Alexander nach drei Texten (Halle: Waisenhaus, 1884. Kinzel describes the manuscript traditions and dating in a useful introduction.
Translation:

[4108] Alexander was told that two tribes living in Paran were causing the world great trouble. Many a brave warrior lay dead, killed by them, and they did not behave themselves as they ought to. Many were tired of life: for they [Gog and Magog] were becoming very powerful [4110] They slew women and children without hesitation; Og and Magog are their names. Alexander set out with a mighty army and conquered them without the prospect of booty* and drove them without hesitating into a great mountain range that borders the Pigine, by the Raging Sea, there he walled in that same army [Og and Magog]: he drove them through a narrow valley, where the path was narrow, and built a wall from one mountain to another, as high as the mountains themselves, and well-defended with strong ramparts. Then he marched on with his army.

* I.e., for the common good.
12. The Latin letter of Prester John (c. 1165):

x. These are the other names associated with the tradition of the 22 or 24 'unclean peoples' originally supposed to have been walled up by Alexander.
13. Peter Comestor, Historia Scholastica (c. 1165):

De Captivitate Decem Tribuum

'Contra hunc ascendit Salmanasar, rex Assyriorum, et factus est ei Osee tributarius. Cumque deprehendisset rex Assyriorum quod Osee rebellare niteretur per Susac regem Aegypti, cui munera miserat, obsedit eum, et vinctum misit in carcerem Ninive, et obsedit Samariam tribus annis, et cepit eam anno nono Osee et sexto Ezechiae, et transtulit Israel in Assyrios,' scilicet septem tribus quae remanserant, 'et posuit eos iuxta fluvium Gozan ultra montes Medorum et Persarum.'

The text in half-quotes is cited, with some abbreviations and variations, from the Vulgate (Liber Malachim 17,3), which reads:

contra hunc ascendit Salmanassar
rex Assyriorum et factus est ei Osee servus reddedbatque illi tributa

cumque deprehendisset rex Assyriorum Osee
quod rebellare nitens misisset nun-tios ad Sua regem Aegypti ne praestaret tributa regi Assyriorum sicut singulis annis solitus erat obsedit eum et vinctum misit in car-cerem

cervagatusque est omnem terram et ascendens Samariam obsedit eam tribus annis anno autem nono Osee cepit rex As-syriorum Samariam et transtulit Israel in Assyrios posuitque eos in Ala et in Habor iuxta fluvium Gozan in civitatibus Medorum

---

14. The Berlin manuscript of the middle High German translation of the Latin letter of Prester John:

1 [32] Ein wazzer strichet da bi vber tageweide dri an eime ende durch min lant
vnde vellet an den selben sant:
5 nie gesach man so groz vlut gan.
[33] Wazzers hat sie keinen tran:
daz da vluzet daz sint steine
vnd groze bloch gemeine.
Da sie vellet in den sant, da verswindet sie zu hant unde enwirdet niemant geware war stoc oder stein hin vare.
Nicht weiz ich, wa von ez si,
in der wochen tage dri 10 jo vor tage stet ez stille:
so vert vber swer da wille.
[41] Die selben steine die so vlozzen haben ein volk beslozzen
der iudischen geslechte mine, 20 der en ist kein die mir nicht dine.

---

3. The only surviving manuscript is that listed by Zarncke as belonging to the "Berliner Bibliothek", Ms. germ. Oct. 56, fol. 1° to 13°, published by Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 951-952; lines 94-96 and 1-17; stanzas 33-39; also published by Hoffmann von Fallersleben in the Altdeutsche Blätter I, 308-324.
32 At one end of my lands, a river flows, three days' march in length, and flows into that same sand (the Sandy Sea): no-one ever saw so great a river.

33 It has not a drop of water in it: what flows are stones and great sharp-edged blocks of wood. Where it runs into the sand, it disappears entirely. And no-one will ever find out where the wood and rocks end up. I do not know why, but on three days of the week, just before day-break it stands still, so that anyone can cross who will.

41 These very stones flowing therein hold enclosed a people of Jewish stock who are under my sway; there is not one who does not serve me.
15. Text from the early sixteenth-century Ambras-Wiener manuscript of the Letter of Prester John; version of the early 14th century:4

41 Vernym was ich mayne:
enhalb des phlumes der staine die zehen geschla'cht der Juden sint besperret, man, weib vnd auch kindt, mit einem gebirg, das wunder hoch ist, die nymmer mer dhaynen tag noch dain frist von derselben vancknu'sse kamen vnd irdischen man nie me vernamen, die Alexander bey alten zeiten,
der da wunderlich hiess nahen vnd weiten,
also lebentige daynne het vertan:
die ich auch in meinem gebot han.
Sy iehent, sy haben herren vnd ku'nnige vnder in;
on zweyfel ich ir aller herre bin.
ir zins gebent sy mir,
von der warheit das sag ich dir,
ze herren sy auch vnnser iehent,
wen sy vnnser gepot sehent.
Translation:
41 Hear what I say:
the other side of the river of stones,
the ten tribes of the Jews are closed, men, women and children,
by a mountain [range] that is marvelously high.
They will never again come out, not on any day or at any time, from this, their prison,
and never have heard more of earthly men.
Alexander, who long ago did wonders,
commanding [the mountains] to come together and go apart, occluded all of them therein alive;
and I am lord over them all.
They claim to have lords and kings among them,
but there is no doubt that I am lord of them all.
They pay me their tribute,
and I tell you truly,
they acknowledge me as their master,
when they see my power and might.

4. Vienna, Ambras- und Hofbibliothek, fol. 235° to the end of the manuscript; published by Zarncke, Der Priester Johannes, 963, vv. 571-588, stanza 41; for dating and details of the manuscript, see Zarncke, ibid., 955ff.
16. Godfrey of Viterbo (1125-1202), Pantheon.25

Vidit Hebraeorum populos quasi millia centum,
Sub duce Salamanas captos inibique retentos,
Qui de Samaria praedas potentis erant.
[25] Fertur Alexander hac plebe petente rogari,
Eius ut auxilio queat in patriam revocari.
Rex, ubi res patuit, non miserebor, ait.
10 Si populo peccante, Deus vos hic relegavit,
Iussa Dei per me nequeunt acuari,
Insuper ipse preces devoto corpore fudit,
Ut Deus hos faceret, alpina recludi,
[35] Quae rex transposita videt huc, conjunctaque tota, Concludunt populos, continuantque loca.
Author reddit rationem cur montes translati sint, utrum per preces Alexandri vel alio iudicio.
[40] Rege petenta fit hoc, sed non prece traduce regis,
Nec prece pagani, fieri tam grandia legi,
Sed prece Christicolae, saepe venire solent.
20 Dummodo transferri montes, rex forte perorat.
Incident in punctum fati quia venerat hora,
[45] Nam si non peteret rex, tamen ista forent.
De Goth et Magoth quos Alexander inter montes conclusit.
30 Finibus Indorum species fuit una virorum,
Goth erat atque Magoth, dictum cognomen eorum, [50] De causis quorum, scribere paucia volo.
Ex aliis scriptis poteris cognoscere quid scitis,
Narrat Esaias, Isidorus, Apocalyps,
35 Tangit etiam in titulis magna sibylla suis.
Carnibus humanis solet haec gens sordida vesci,
[55] Quid sit rex, vel lex, vel dux, vel ius ibi nescit,
Regula tunc illis normaque nulla fuit.
Fertur ab his lupus atque canis vel rana vorari,
40 Funeribus voluit Goth, atque Magoth, saturari,
[267,1] Tuba cadaveribus vescitur ore pari.

In part X, however, the Jews are saved, and thus specifically excluded from the ranks of Antichrist’s servants, who are Gog and Magog enclosed by Alexander:

6. See Augustine’s etymological description, above, no. 7.

7. Pantheon, 257.
et cum completi fuerunt 122 anni, Iudaei convertentur ad Dominum, et erit ab omnibus

Concerning the Ten Tribes:

18. Hugo Ripelin de Argentina, O.P. (1210-1270), Compendium theologicae veritatis:

[Liber Septimus]

De gog et magog, Cap. x.

---

Ulm: Johannes Zainer, 1481 (Hain 437; Gesamtkatalog der Wiegedrucke 600). The passages reproduced here are from book 7. Other printings include Ulm, no year (the volume in which it is bound, Wolfenbüttel Li 4° 2, dates from 1473 (Hain 435); Paris [Francis Regnault], 1508 and Venice, 1588.
Alexander, after having accomplished many wondrous deeds, traveled before his death to the mountains called the Caspian Mountains. Therein he found the ten tribes of the imprisoned Jews. They wanted to come out but could not because they had forsaken God and worshipped idols. When Alexander learned of their abominations, he let them be walled up therein so that they could not come out, even if they wanted to. But no human efforts could ever achieve the construction of these walls. So Alexander begged God to help him, as they [the 'Jews'] had sinned against God. Then the two mountains moved together on account of Alexander’s prayers, even though he was a heathen, and enclosed the Jews therein. There they are to stay until the time that is close to the Last Day. Then they will come out and commit much slaughter among the people [Christians].
After describing the Mongol (Tatar) invasions of 1240-41 and the "Tartars" themselves, Matthew comments:

Creduntur isti Tartari, quorum memoria est detestabilis, fuisse de decem tribubus, qui abierunt, relictà lege Mosaica, post vitulos aureo; quos etiam Alexander Macedo primo conatus est includere in praeruptis montibus Caspiorum molaribus bituminatis. Quod opus cum videret humanos labores excedere, invocavit auxilium Dei Israel; et coierunt cacumina montium adinvicem, et factus est locus inaccessibilis et immeabilis. Super quem locum dicit Josephus, 'Quanta faciet Deus pro fidei, qui tantum fecit pro infidelii?' Unde liquet, Deum noile ut exeat. Veruntamen, sicut scribitur in scholastica historia, exibunt circa finem mundi, magnam stragem hominum facturi. Emergit autem dubietas, si isti sint nunc exeuntes Tartari, cum non utantur lingua Hebraica, nec legem sciant Mosaicam, nec utantur vel regantur legalibus institutis. Ad quod respondetur quod nihilominus credibile est, quod isti sunt de inclusis de quibus mentio praelibatur.

The version known as the Chronica maior was published in the Rolls Series by Henry R. Luard (London, 1872-1883) in five volumes and is cited by Anderson Alexander's Gate, 70-71, from vol. IV, 77f. The Historia was published at London in 1571. I have given variant readings from the latter (Wolfenbüttel Gr 4° 11, 732, line 24ff).

1571: Dominum.

1571: Scholastica.

1571: dubium.

Matthew is not so critical as to give up the popular thesis that the Tatars were the apocalyptic (Comestorine) Ten Tribes, despite clear evidence to the contrary. This evidence Matthew cites then dismisses as mere appearance: they may not look or sound like Jews, but the evil essence is the same. The 1571 edition continues as follows: "Sei sicut etiam adhuc in ducatu Mosaico corda eorum rebellia in reprobrum sensum sunt conversa, ita ut irent post Deos alienos et ritus ignotos, ita et nunc magis prodigaliter, ita ut ab omni alia natione ignoretur, cor eorum et lingua confunditur, et ita in ferinam

13038 waz er [Alexander] mit den Juden ie
grozer wunder begie, 13040 daz seit der wise Josephus.
der heilige Metodius,
der schreip von im diu maere
wie er Gog Mâgog beslôz, 13045 die vervluochten künne grôz..."

Translation:

13038 ...the great marvels he then performed concerning the Jews are recounted by 13040 Josephus the Wise.
Saint Methodius,
a martyr of Christ,
writes about Alexander that he enclosed the great and damnable clan 13045 (people) Gog Magog.

Verses 16,837-16,996:

16838 der zehen geslehte hêrschaft
wuôhs manec jâr in Caspiâ:
16840 sie sâzen zinsliche dâ den Persen sunder widerstrît manec jâr unz an die zit daz sie bevunden maere
daz der wunderaere 16845 Alexander der wigant
haet überwunden diu lant und vûr diu riche dar was komn.
ouch hâten sie von im vernomn die êre - als ich iu hân geseit - 16850 die er mit grôzer werdekeit in Jerûsalem den Juden tete.
sie santen zim und was ir bete daz er sie lieze mit ir scharn
vrîliche ze lande värn, 16855 daz man in niht taete.

---

crudelitatem et insipientam Deo vindice commutatur. This second use of 'ignoro' shows that to Matthew, the unknown was greatly to be feared.

al ei edel degen staete vrágte dô der maere durch waz schulde waere
diz gróze her gevangen dâ.

16860 dô sagte man dem kunge sô
rehte wie ez was geschehn und als ich iu hân verjehn daz sie durch des tiuvels spot verkurn gar den hoehsten Got 16865 und sprâchen Baal ir gebet, swaz in Got gnâden ie getet.

Der künec smierliche sprach
daz doch niht durch quot geschach
"dëswâr, sî sî den hoehsten Got 16870 durch ir untriuwen gebot

hânt verlâzen und verkorn und sît sie durch sînen zorn sô lange sint gevangen hie, sô wil ich baz besliezen sie.

16927 Alsua sint sie behalten und müezen iemer alten mit der vancnisse dâ

16930 in der vil wilden Caspiâ
unz an die jungesten zît als uns diu schrift urkunde gît, sô werdent sie her ûz gelân.
die welt muoz von in kumber hân

16935
und schaden vil mit arbeit, als uns der wissage seit.

16965 Mit endehafter wârheit die vancnisse hât geseit der gewaere Josephus.
da bi seit Metódîus
der rehte und der gewaere

16970
ouch ein ander maere, der was ze Patres in der stat
zeinem rihtaere gesat ein bischof nâch der kristenheit der durch Krist die martel leit,

16975 der beguonde suochent
obe er an den buochen vunde keiniu maere
der vergezzen waere
und in latine niht geschribn.

16980
in kriesch und in ëbrêisch belibn.
dô vant er nütziu maere
diu der vil gewaere Jeronimus niht tet erkant und sie ouch lîhte niender vant und dâ von an im belibn ungeseit und ungeschriibn.
er trift vil kurzliche die scheidunge der riche und wie sie nach den ersten man die scheidunge huoben an und wie diu welt verenden sol, daz hât sin maere gendet wol.
swaz der von Alexander seit ungelogener wârheit.
The power and might of the ten tribes grew for many years in Caspia:
they were docile tributaries of the Persians for many years, until the time when they heard that the marvel-maker,
Alexander the great warrior had conquered many lands and had arrived at [the gates of] their kingdom. They had also heard of the wonders -- as I have told you -- that he conferred, with great dignity, on the Jews at Jerusalem. They sent to him, and their request was that he allow them to travel with their entire array and troops, unhindered, to their homeland, and that they be accorded safe conduct.
The noble and steadfast warrior wanted to know for what sins that great army was captive there.
They told the king the truth, exactly how it happened, just as I have told you: that they were snared in the Devil's toils, renounced Almighty God, and prayed to Baal, for whatever mercies God had ever shown them.
The king spoke with an ironic smile entirely devoid of friendliness or good will: "Truly, since they had lost and renounced God Almighty by their faithless actions, and since they have been imprisoned here for so long on account of his wrath, I will enclose them even more effectively."
Alexander undertakes to build a formidable wall, but realizes that he needs divine help, for which he numbly prays. God answers his prayer.
Thus they are captive, and must grow old in that prison, in the wilds of Caspia, until the End Time when they will be let out,
as Scripture tells us.
The world will suffer much from them,
and much damage and misery,
as the prophecy says.
[Rudolf mentions that he had read elsewhere -- probably in the letter of Prester John -- of the waterless sea of sand that encloses this land and this people, and of the high stone walls surrounding 'Caspia' -- a detail derived from the Younger Titurel.]
Josephus the reliable described the prison
in complete and true detail.
And Methodius
tells another tale.
He was in the city of Patras, appointed as a judge
and bishop according to the Christian tradition.
He later suffered martyrdom for Christ's sake.
He looked to see whether he could find in books any story that had been forgotten,
and not written down in Latin,
but preserved in Greek or Hebrew.
There he found useful accounts which the highly reliable Jerome had not mentioned, and perhaps had not found anywhere, and since then had not been talked about or written down until he [saw them].
He touches very briefly on the separation of the kingdoms [Christ's and Satan's] and how the separation started after the very first man [Adam],
and how the world will end,
which is the proper end to his account.
What he says of Alexander is the truth without the shadow of a lie.
22. Rudolf von Ems, Weltchronik:

1473 An disin selbin bergin lit und stozent dran vil nahe bi 1475 die berge montes Kaspii:
das ist ein hoch gebirge groz:
mit dën und mit dem mer besloz Alexander der riche sit vil gewaltechliche 1480 zwei geslehte, das was Gog, das andir ist genant Magog,
dé gein der welte endis zil der erde fügent kumbirs vil
und wet*ndū herzeleit 1485 mit vorhtliche erbeit, so si werdent uz virlan
und in das tor wirt uf getan da si mit Gotis kreftin groz
Alexander mit besloz 1490 vil gewaltechliche.

Translation:

[1473] Close to these mountains and touching them not far off [1475] are the mountains called the montes Kaspii:
they are great, high mountains:
with them and with the sea
Alexander the merciful enclosed with great force [1480] two nations, one called Gog and the other called Magog, who, as the world reaches its end will cause great suffering on earth and painful, heart-felt sorrow [1485] and frightful misery, when they are let out and the gates are opened for them, with which Alexander enclosed them with God's great power [1480] and with his own might.

* Rudolf von Ems Weltchronik. Aus der Wernigeroder Handschrift, ed. Gustav Ehrismann (Berlin, 1915), 21. This passage seems to have been taken from Honorius' De imagine mundi, or perhaps from the middle High German Lucidarius.
Vincent of Beauvais (1190-1264), Speculum Historiale (c. 1250):

Ex historia Scholastica. Cum venisset Alexander ad montes Caspios, miserunt filii captivitatis 10 tribuum, postulantes ab eo egrediendi licentiam; ex edicto enim tenebantur egredi non licere. Cumque quaesisset causam captivitatis, acceptae eos aperte recessisse a Deo Israel, vitulis aureis immolando, et per prophetas esse praedictum eos, a captivitate non redituros. Tunc Alexander respondit, quod digni erant arctius includi. Cumque angusta viarum obstrueret molibus bituminatis, et videret laborem humanum ad hoc non sufficere, oravit Dominum Deum Israel, ut opus illud completeret; et liquido apparat non esse voluntatem Dei ut egrediant. hic addit Iosephus dicens, Deus quid facturus est pro fidelibus suis, si tantum fecit pro infidelibus? Solinus. Portae Caspiae panduntur itinere manufacto longo 3 milibus passuum, nam latitudo vix plaustro est permeabilis. In his angustiis etiam illud asperum est quod praecisorum laterum saxa liquentibus inter se salis venis exsudent humorem affluentissimum, qui constrictus vi caloris velut in aestivam glaciem corporatur. et ita labes in via accessum negat: praeterea et 20 milibus passuum tractus omnis quoquomodo inde pergatur, nullis puteis vel fontibus humo aride sive praesidio, sitit. Tunc serpentes undique gentium convenae, a verno statim die illuc confluunt, et ita periculi et difficultatis concordia, ad Caspios nisi hyeme accessus negatur.

—. Cited from Bibliotheca Mundi, seu Speculi Maioris Vincentii Burgundi Praesulii Bellovacensis, Ordinis Praedicatorum, Theologia Doctoris Eximii, Tomus Quartus, qui Speculum Historiale inscriptur (Duaci, ex officina Balthazaris Belleri, 1624), book IV, ch. xliii. The first printing dates from 1473 (Strasbourg). This medieval encyclopedia was compiled by Vincent under the patronage of the crusading king Louis IX (St. Louis; reigned 1226-1270).

1 Quia vero de montibus Caspiis hic facta est mentio, hic unum quod in dubium mihi venerit inserere volo. Cum enim dicit historie nostre scholastice quod Alexander Magnus rex Macedonum oratione impetravit a domino reclusionem

5 Iudeorum intus Montes Caspios, ipsosque circa finem mundi praedicent exituros, fratres nostri sancti ordinis praedicatorum in Georgia civitate Triphelis [Tiflis?] que prope montes Caspios est per vii annos commorati sunt diligenter a Georgianis et a Persis et etiam a Iudeis de inclusione illa inquesierunt et dicunt omnes etiam Iudei quod nihil penitus inde sciunt nec unquam istud in suis historiis invenerunt. Hoc autem scriptum habent tantummodo quod Alexander ille quosdam immundos et horribiles prope montes Caspios habitantes qui alios

10 homines et etiam seinvicem comedebant intra montes illos habitare coegit et etiam ibi portas extrui fecit que videlicet adhuc porte Alexandri dicte sunt. Unamque illarum Tartari confreguerunt, ceterum de reclusione hominum in montibus illis nihil aliud reperietur in locis er [Alexander] wart des berichtet rehte,

15 illis.

---

daz sie waern der zehen geslehte, der hiez Gog
und der ander hiez Magog,

daz die irn schepher verkurn
und die rehte ë verlurn, als in die gap der sűeze got,
und beten an die apgot.
im wart mé unreinekeit

von den Juden geseit:
daz sie slangen unde kroten
aezen und under in die tőten.
Nu hoert wie der werde fuor.
ir bliben er aldá swuor:
er wolde verlimen in die cluns.
nů ist also gesaget uns

daz der edel fürste gehéret sin gebet gegen gute kërët.
er sprach 'ô du allerhoehster got,
din gewalt und din gebot du aller dinge ein fundamint, sol diese tuuvelische kint
kreftic hie besliezen.
lâ dich des niht verdriezen, daz din ander volc daz werde
von in niht geerget werde.'
der sűeze got durch sin gebet vor al dem volc ein wunder tet:
im tet an der selben stunt von himel eine stimme kunt, daz sin betliche wort
unser hérrë haete erhört;
daz volc solde sin gevangen dâ.
dô begunden sich die berge sâ

vaste ze houfen drücken und also zesamne smücken, daz dar inne die unsűezen
ôf die zît bliben müezen, biz daz die argen boesen
der Endecrist sol loesen, bi dem sie ôf der erden gar gewaldic werden.

Wendelin Toischer (Tübingen, 1888; =BLVS, 115), 556ff.
Translation:

[20901] He [Alexander] received correct information, that they were the ten tribes, and among them one king was called Gog and the other was called Magog;

[20905] they had renounced their Creator and lost the true Law which was given to them by our dear Lord; and they worshipped idols. More foul things were told him concerning the Jews:

[20910] that they ate snakes and frogs, and those of their own numbers who died. Now hear how the worthy Alexander reacted. He swore they would stay there for ever:

[20915] the noble prince addressed his prayers to God. He said: 'O thou almighty God,

[20920] [by] thy power and [by] thy commandment, O thou foundation of the world, shouldst thou mightily enclose this devilish people here. Do not allow thyself to be angered:

[20925] do not allow your other peoples, the worthy ones, to be plagued by these [wretches].' Merciful God was moved by his prayer, and worked a miracle for all to see:

[20930] a heavenly voice announced to him that his prayerful word had been heard by our Lord; this people was to be enclosed there. Then the mountains began to move toward one another and press against each other so that the foul folk must stay inside until the time when they, wicked and evil as they are,

[20935] will be freed by the Antichrist, in whose company they will become very mighty on earth.

[20940] Concerning the middle High German word unrein, see chapter III.
fol. 7"
Cap. xi: de exitu decem tribuum de loco captivitatis

13. Nuremberg, 1471 (Wolfenbüttel Li 4° 193; Hain 8993); book I, chapters xi and xii.
methodii p(ar[im]) primo illam finalem pacem [qualis primus???] non erit fore ante persecucionem fiendam per filios .x. tribuum gog et magog. hec expresse insinuat cum dicit. Cum itaque fuerit pax tunc reserabuntur porte caspie in lateribus aquilonis et gentes iste cum gog et magog ven-[35]nient. Advertendum eciam quod non dicit quod gentes iste exiture debeant esse gog et magog. Est autem dubium quia dicit illam gentem esse de progenie iaphet, sed de progenie sem mediante abraam ysaac et iacob ut plane patet in genesim. Sed responderi forte potest quod gentes ille inter quas translate sunt decem tribus ultra dictos montes caspios de stirpe iaphet fuerunt in quas quasi transierunt per [40] captivitatem dicti filii x tribuum et propter hoc racionabiliter credi potest quod eos dicit de progenie propter eos quibus per captivitatem commixti et coniuncti [fol. 8', 1] Dubium aliud videtur esse que sit ista civitas quam finaliter capient et post cuius capcionem per unum principem missum a domino percucentur fulgere etigne. Et quia illud concordat cum destructione capitis eorum scilicet anticristo [sic] quem regem sibi preficient (infra capitulo de destructione anticristi per hiesum [5] cristiem fiendam) clare vel quo[modo?] ad litteram impleri debeant apparebit. Postremo valde dubium est que sint iste gentes gog et magog cum quibus venture x tribus ultimam persecucionem ecclesie adimplebunt. Et qui sancti de hoc valde varie loquuntur et diversas opiniones circa hoc recitant. Sequens capitulum ad hoc convenieter ordinari debet de hoc ut diverse opiniones in eo subscribantur. [10] Capitulum duodecimum de gog et magog. Beatus hieronimus xi capitulo super ezechielecm in principio sic dicit. "Scias, o virgo [sic: virgine] eustochium orandum tibi esse per nobis in prophetia difficilima illud breviter admoinebo quod vir nostre etatis haud ignobilis ad imperatorem scribens super hac nacione dixerit: 'gog ille gotus est' cui qua raci-[15]one possint omnia que in prophetia scripta sunt coaptari. non est meum sed eorum qui hoc putaverunt disserere." Ecce prima opinio quod populus gog sit populus gottorum. Et in eodem libro incipiens exponere xxxviii capitulum eiusdem libri quod videtur esse totum ad litteram de hac gente super illo verbo: "fili hominis pone faciem tuam contra gog et terram magog

". The "vir nostrae aetatis haud ignobilis" cited by Jerome (CChr LXXV.480, 14-19; see text 5 above) is Ambrose (PL XVI.611-612).

---

13. Cited from Jerome, ‘Commentary on Ezekiel’ (11,38) CChr LXXV. 525,1476 - 526,1492.
etc." subdit non intelligentes totum volumen iohannis quod revelacionis titulo pernotatur esse misticum et revelacione nos indigere in eodem glossa autem super apocalipsim xx solvetur sathanas de cathena et seducet gen-[10]tes qui sunt super quatuor angulos terre gog et magog etc. sic dicit: "gog id est de tecto id est omnem persecutores dyabolum in se tegentes at tandem ad apertam perfectionem procedentes vel ad litteram has duas gentes prius seducet et per eas ad alias procedet." Hec glossa. Aliqui autem moderni non parve auctoritatis illam gentem pocius volunt et credunt esse tartaros et credunt eas [15] esse x tribus illas quondam inclusas, que iam exiverunt, cum illius gentis ignoretur origo, coniecturant quam probare quod per eos ecclesia ultimam persecutionem sit passura. Illud tamen authenticum fundamentum non habet cum magis appareat oppositum eo quod populus iste tartarorum signa legis filiorum ysrahel non habeat a quibus tamen non videtur probable filios x tribuum penitus [20] recessisse. Qualiter cunque igitur accipiatur gog et magog sive pro determinatis nacionibus ut volunt tres opiniones que tamen certitudinem non habent sive per omnium nacionis perversis qui tempore antichristi et tempore solucionis sathane de suo carcere et habitaculis ad antichristum congregabuntur in prelium contra sanctos cum gog et magog venient et exibunt filii captivitatis de- [25]cem tribuum, quia cum perversis illi copulati cristi ecclesiam ultima persecutione affligent ut qualitercumque gog et magog accipiatur, vel ad litteram vel per allegoriam, tamen dictum propheticum beati methodii in nullo aliqua columna conquassatur.

17. Matthew of Paris, for instance.

18. I.e., circumcision.

19. Probably 'calumnia'.
27. Seifrit’s Alexander (c. 1352): 50

4206 do er [Alexander] übér das pirg cham, er vant ain diet fraissam,
die was unrain und scheuczlich
und an schiessen fraislich.
4210 zawbern und nyграмenczey und allew pasheit wont in pey.
sy warn pos und gar verczait an tugenden und an beschaidentheit.
sy assen hunt und alles viech, 4215 es wer gesunt oder siech,
ez wer roch oder gesoten;
sy assen natern und chrotten.
in was nichts wider zem,
es was in alles quett und genem.
4220 wenn die leut sterben oder wie sy sunst verderben von welicher lay geschicht, der begrabens ainen nicht:
sy fressen sy gar und gar
4225 (das ich sag, das ist war)
Gok und Magokch sind sy genant, geborn von der Juden landt.
der chunig Salmanasar
von Nyniphe furt sy dar 4230 gevangen vor virhundert jarn, 51
wann sy Got ungerecht warn.
also sindt sy in der poshait
beliben und so gar verczait.
Got hat in selber verflu’cht.
4235 das er ir nymermer geruecht hie und dort geleich in himel und in erttreich.
Essechiel und Jeremias habent von in gewissagt das.
4240 wer die wibel hat gelesen,
dem mag es wol chund wesen war umb es Got hat getan oder wie sy es verwarcicht han.
do der chaiser das erkannt

---

51. Four hundred years before the time of Alexander. Seifrit cannot mean in the tenth century of our era.
4245 und ir pashait recht ervant, er voricht und gedacht im zehant,
ob sy chemen in die lant, das sy die welt unrainnten und die leut vermainten.

4250 Allexander in gepot das sy sich sambten alle dratt mit weiben und mit chinden.
des wolt er nicht erwinden,
er furt sy furbert an ain stat.

4255 den hogsten Got er tewr pat das er im hulf besliessen und liess in des geniessen das er sein inniklich pet, und es der welt zu nucze tet.

4260 Got ist so mild und so quet, hes man in pit mit rechtem muett
und hes man in andacht an in gert, das er des gar dikch gewert.
also tet er alhie,

4265 ein wunder er geschehen lie.
zwain hoch pergen er gepot das sy zesamen giennngen dratt.
das er gepot, das geschach.
die perig man an ain ander sach

4270 gen und wachsen alczuhant und verslyssen leut und lannt.
das geipir chain endt nyndert hat,
sein hoch durich die gewolkchen gat.
Allexander pawt da vor

4275 czway grasew eyssneinew tar.
er bestrachs mit assyntiton,
da wurdens starkch und vest von.
das sy mit fewr nyemant
noch mit eyssen gewynnen chan.

4280 assyntiton das hat die chraft und ist also werhaft das aller stachel und eyssen muess vor im prechen ind reyssen, es lescbt alles fewr gar.

4285 was ich auch sag, das ist war:
sy sund verslossen also ser,
sy mugen heraus nyemmer mer;
niemant auch zu in mag
von hinn unczt an den jungisten tag.

4290 yedoch hab wir fur bar vernomen das sy schullen her aus kumen noch vor des jungisten tages frist und schullen mit dem Anterchrist erhriegen die christenhait.
4295 wer das gelebt, dem sey das laid!
Translation:

[4206] When he came over the mountains, he found a terrifyingly wild people that was foul, unnatural and disgusting, and frighteningly good with the bow.

[4210] They are constantly engaged in magic and necromancy and all forms of wickedness. They were evil and entirely lacking in virtue and modesty. They ate dogs and all manner of animals, not caring whether they were healthy or sick, raw or cooked; they ate vipers and frogs. Nothing was disgusting to them, they found everything good and pleasant.

[4215] When these people die, or otherwise come to harm, no matter how, they are not buried: they eat them up entirely (what I say is true). Gog and Magog they are called, they are of Jewish patrimony. King Salmanasar drove them there as captives, four hundred years before, because they had been untrue to God. And they remained in their wickedness, and even got worse. God himself has cursed them, so that he will never again call them, here as there, neither on earth nor in heaven. Ezekiel and Jeremiah prophesied that he would do this.

[4220] Anyone who has read the Bible will have learned why God did this, or rather, why they deserved it.

[4225] When the Emperor [Alexander] discovered this and recognized their wickedness, he was afraid and wondered what would happen if they were to break out into other lands: they would make the whole world unclean.

2. The word used in middle High German is vnrein; see chapter III.
and their evil deeds would stain and curse everyone.

Alexander ordered them to assemble quickly with their women and children.
He could not be moved to change his mind,
and he led them even farther off to another place.

He begged God Almighty sincerely to help him enclose them,
and God was pleased to accede to Alexander’s wish,
because he to him [God] prayed so earnestly,
and because he did it for the good of the world.

God is so generous and so good,
that whatever one asks from him piously,
and in the right spirit,
he very often grants,
and that is what he did in this case.

He allowed a miracle to occur:
he ordered that two high mountains move together on the spot.
What he ordered, happened.
The mountains were seen to move together and to grow into each other, enclosing both land and people.
The mountains have no end anywhere and go right up through the clouds.
In front of them, Alexander built two great iron gates.
These he coated them with assyntiton,
so that they became strong and fast,
so hardened that they cannot be breached
by fire or by iron.

Assyntiton has the power,
and is so strong,
that all steel and iron must break and tear when they meet it;
it even extinguishes all fire.

What I tell you is true:
they are so well enclosed that they can never escape, nor can anyone reach them,
from then until the Judgement Day.

However, we have been truly told that they shall break out just before the Last Day and make war on Christendom together with the Antichrist.

Whosoever lives through that will wish he had not!

Alexander next comes to the ‘Portas Cassias’, very high mountains that surround India, and are closed with 'iron gates' -- a vestigial version of the preceding story!}
The middle High German Historienbibel (14th/15th centuries):

Daniel wissaget und spricht. Der endchrist kompt von tribu in Babilonia und wirt geboren von dem bösten man und wib und wenn er empfangen wirt so fert der böß geist mit im in und wirt mit im geboren und erzogen und haist ain sun des to'des und gelobt alle welt an im und wirt grosse kunst han und würkt falsche zaiche und findt all verborgen schätz. Und haisset sich got und beschindt sich und haist sich Messias und buwt Salomons tempel wider und setzt einen küngstül darin und loffend all juden gegen im. Und verkert die menschen mit grosser schrecken und zucht sy mit grossem geld an sich und mit sylber und mit ga'b und mit andren zaichin und tött alle cristanliche mensch und tött o'ch Helyas und Enoch die werdent all an dem dritten tag wider lebendig. Und sendt sin zwölff botten und zwen und sybentzig junger in alle land zu bredigen und brediget vierthalb ja'r und haist sich mitten in dem tempel für got anbetten und zücht die Juden an sich und spricht, er sye Messias und tritt in die füßtritt Cristi und spricht er wolle gen himel faren uff dem Gilberg.

Translation:

[1] Daniel prophecies and says: The Antichrist will come from the tribe [of Dan] in Babylon and will be born of the most evil man and woman and when he is conceived, the evil spirit [Satan] will enter [the womb] with him and will be born with him and raised up and called a son of death and all the world shall believe in him and he will be very crafty, working false marvels and finding all buried treasures. And he will call himself God and circumsize himself and call himself Messiah and rebuild Solomons Temple and place his throne therein and all the Jews will come running to him. And he will pervert humanity with great terrors and draw them to himself with much money and silver and valuable gifts and with other signs. He will kill all Christians and kill Elijah and Enoch and they will come back to life on the third day.

[15] He will send twelve messengers and seventy-two disciples out into all lands to preach and he will preach four and a half years and command, in the middle of the Temple, that he be worshipped as God, and he will draw the Jews to himself and say, he is the Messiah, and follow in Christ’s footsteps [imitate him] and say that he wants to ascend to heaven from the Mount of Olives.
Das dy zehen geslecht peslossen wurden und das der chunig Alexander starb.

Do der chunig Alexander chom zu dem gepirg Caspios, do sandten dy geslecht dy da gefangen waren und peslossen und patten in, das er in urlaub gund heraus zechomen und sy ledigt. Do der Alexander fragt dy sach irer vankchnus, do wart in geantburt und sy hetten sich offentlich gesetzt und gechert von dem lebentig got und hetten in guldene chelbel gemacht und das sy von der vankchnus chämen und hetten dy angepetten. Do wart in gesagt von gottes weissagen, das sy von der vänkchnüs nicht wider chämen. Do hieß er sy mer versließen und daz den leuten unmegleich was, das man dy weg mer verspert dann sy vor worden. Do rufft er got von Israhel an, das er das werch volprecht und do ließen sich dy perg czu ainander, das man furpas czu in nicht chomen mocht. Dapey merkcht man offenleich, das es gottes wil nicht was, das sy auch chämen. Doch an der leczten zeit der welt werden sy herfür chomen und werden ain gros volkch verderben.

"Ibid., 3LVS, 100, family IIb: "O herr Jesu Christ".

Cl. Merzdorf lists 3 manuscripts from the 15th century (100,23). This passage draws on Rudolf von Ems' Weltchronik, and ultimately on Comestor's Historia scholastica.
Translation:

[1] How the Ten Tribes were enclosed and how king Alexander died.

When king Alexander had come to the Caspian mountains, the tribes enclosed therein sent to him and begged him that he free them and allow them to come out. When Alexander asked after the reason for their imprisonment, they answered they had openly turned away from the living God and made themselves golden calves, and that they came from prison [sic] and worshipped them. Then God spoke to him through prophecy, saying they should not be allowed out of their confinement. Then Alexander ordered them to be shut up more securely, and [it happened] that his people were unable to block the path any better than it had been blocked before. Then Alexander appealed to the God of Israel to finish the job, and the mountains approached each other, such that no-one could reach them [the Ten Tribes] ever again. This shows clearly, that it was not God's will for them to come out. However, in the last age of the world, they will break out and slaughter many people.

5. I. e ., they were imprisoned for worshipping the golden calves.
The middle English translation of Mandeville’s Travels (fourteenth century), in chapter 29, “Of the contrees and yles beyonde Cathay”.

[6] In that same regioun ben the mountaynes of Caspye that men clepen Vber in the contree. Betwene tho mountaynes the Iewes of x. lynages ben enclosed, that men clepen Goth and Magoth, and thei move not gon out on no syde. There weren [10] enclosed xxii. kynges with hire peple that dwelleden betwene the mountaynes of Sychyre, there kyng Alisandre chacede hem betwene tho mountaynes, and there he thoughte for to enclose hem thorgh werk of his men. But whan he saugh that he myghte not don it ne brying it to an ende, he preyed to God of [15] Nature that He wolde parforme that that he had begonne. And alle were it so that he was a payneme and not worthi to ben herd, yit God of His grace closed the mountaynes togydre, so that thei dwellen there alle fast ylokked and enclosed with high mountaynes alle aboute, saf only on o syde, [20] and on that side is the see of Caspye. Now may sum men asken, Sith that the see is on that o syde, wherfore go thei not out on the see syde for to go where that hem lyketh? But to this questioun I schal answere; that see of Caspye goth out be londe vnder the mountaynes and renneth be [25] the desert at o syde of the contree, and after it strecceth unto the endes of Persie. And alle though it be clepte a see, it is no see ne it toucheth to non other see, but it is a lake, the grettest of the world. And though thei wolden putten hem into that see, thei ne wysten neuer where that thei scholde arryuen. And also [30] thei conen no language but only hire owne, that no man knoweth but thei. And therefore mowe thei not gon

---

Mandeville’s Travels, ed. M.C. Seymour (Oxford, at the Clarendon Press, 1967), 192-193. This version, known as the Cotton Version, is a conflation made about 1400. It is based on two lost manuscripts of fourteenth-century Middle English translations of the French original, c. 1357 -- itself a congeries of citations from Vincent of Beauvais, Odoric of Pordenone (for both of which, see Appendix I), William of Boldensele’s account of the Holy Land (1336), Haiton’s Fleurs des Histoires d’Orient (before 1308), and other sources. (Seymour, xiv-xv and xx). The enormous popularity of ‘Mandeville’, and the great credence given it -- Columbus had a copy, along with Marco Polo’s description of the East, on his sea voyage westward in 1492 -- is attested to by the more than 250 surviving manuscripts in all the western European languages, and by its numerous printed editions.
out. And also yee schulle vnderstonde that the Iewes han no propre lond of hire owne for to dwellen inne in alle the world, but only that lond betwene the mountaynes. And yit thei yelden tribute for that lond to the queen of Amazoine, the whiche [193, 1] that maketh hem to ben kept cloos fulle diligently that thei schulle not gon out on no syde but be the cost of hire lond. For hire lond marcheth to tho mountaynes. [The Jews rarely leave, as the passes are narrow and there are deserts beyond, full "of dragouns, of serpentes, and of other venymous bestes"; 16...] And thogh it happenesum of hem be fortunate to gon out, thei conen no maner oflanguage but Ebrew, so that thei can not speke to the peple. And yit natheless men seyn thei schulle gon out in the tyme of [20] Antechrist, and that thei schulle maken gret slaughter of Christene men. And therfore alle the Iewes that dwellen in alle londes lernen alleweys to spoken Ebrew in hope that whan the other Iewes schulle gon out, that thei may vnderstonden hire speche and to leden hem into Christendom for to destroye the Christene [25] peple. For the Iewes seyn that thei knowen wel be hire prophecyes that thei of Caspye schulle gon out and spreden thorphout alle the world, and that the Christene men schulle ben vnder hire subieccoun als longe as thei han ben in subieccoun of hem.

APPENDIX C: ANTICHRIST AND THE JEWS AT THE END OF TIME

1. Tiburtine Sibyl (fourth century):'

[1] Ernst Sackur, Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen (Halle, 1898), 185-186.
2. Pseudo-Methodius (seventh century):

immundas et aspectu [h]orribilis. Sunt autem ex filiis Iapheth nepotes, quorum immundiciam videns ex[h]orruit. Comdebat enim hi omnes cantharo speciem omnem coinquinabilum vel spursebilem, id es canes, mures, serpentes, morticinorum carnes, aborticia informabilia corpora, et ea que in alvo necdum per leniamenta [lineamenta] coaculata sunt vel ex aliiqua parte membrorum producto conpago formam figmenti possit perficere vultum vel figuram exprimere et haec iumentorum necnon etiam et omne speciem ferarum inmundarum. Mortuos autem nequaquam sepeliunt, sed sepe comedent eos. Haec vero universa contemplatus Alexander ab eis inmunditer et sceleriter fieri timens, ne quando eant exilientes in terra sancta et illa contaminent a pollutis suis iniquissimis affectationibus, depraecatus est Deum insensius. et praecipiens congregavit eos omnes mulieresque eorum et filius et omnia scilicet castra illorum et eduxit eos de terra orientali et conclusit minans eos, donec introissent in finibus aquilonis. Et non est introitus nec exitus ab orientem in occidentem, quis per quod possit ad eos transire vel introire. Continuo ergo supplicatus est Deum Alexander, et exaudivit eius obsecrationem. Et praecipit dominus Deus duobus montibus, quibus est vocabulum 'ubera aquilonis', et adiuncti proximaverunt invicem usque ad duodecim cubitorum. Et construxit portas aereas et superinduxit eas asincitum, ut si voluerint eas patefacere in ferro, non possent, aut dissolvere per ignem, nec valeant utrumque, sed statim ignis omnis extinguitur. Talis enim est natura asinciti, quia neque ferro confringitur ictus neque igne suscipit resolutionem. Universas enim adinventiones daemonum et calitates mortiferas vel supervacuas operantur haec obscinsissime et deforme vel sordidae gentes, cuncta que magicae artis malorum abutuntur immunditer etiam hiis. Illorum sordidam et inhumanam, magis autem, ut competenter dicitur, Deo odibilem destructa est maleficia, ita ut non possent neque ferro neque per igne vel quodcumque libet aliud astuciam easdem rererare vel aperire portas et fugire. In novissimis vero temporibus secundum Ezechiels prophetiam, Sackur, Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen, 72-75.

J. Adso (910-992), Libellus de Antichristo ad Gerbergam Reginam (c. 950):\

His Birth:"\n
1 Sicut ergo auctores nostri dicunt, Antichristus ex populo Judaerorum nascetur de tribu Dan, secundum prophetiam dicentem: "Fiat Dan coluber in via, et cerastes in semita, mordens ungulam equi, ut cadat ascensor eius retro" (Gen. 49,17). Sicut enim serpens sedebit in via et in semita erit, ut eos qui per semitam justitiae ambulaverint, feriat, et veneno suae malitiae occidat. Nascetur autem ex patris et matris copulatione, sicut alii himines, non ut quidam fabulantur de sola virgine."

In Jerusalem:\n
1 Deinde Hierosolymam veniens, omnes Christianos quos se non poterit convertere, per varia tormenta jugulabit, et suam sedem in templo sancto parabit. Templum etiam destructum, quod Salomon Deo paravit, aedificabit, et in statum suum restaurabit, et circumcidet se, et Filium Dei omnipotentis se esse mentitur. Reges autem et principes primum ad se convertere, et deinde per illos caeteros populos.

Again in Jerusalem:~

1 Nam sicut supra diximus, in civitate Babyloniae natus, Hierusalem veniens circumcidet se dicens Judaeis: Ego sum Christus vobis repromissus, qui ad salutem vestram veni, ut vos, qui dispersi estis, congegrem et defendam. Tunc ad eum concurrent omnes Judaei, et existimantes se recipere Christum, recipiunt diabolum, secundum quod Dominus in Evangelio ait Judaeis: "Ego veni in nomine Patris mei, et non recepistis me; si altus venerit in nomine suo, hunc recipietis" (John 5,43).

---

1. PL CI (in second volume of Alcuin’s works).
2. PL CI.1292b.
3. PL CI.1293c.
4. Kings and princes convert to him first: not the Jews!
5. A recapitulation; PL.1295d - 1296a.
After the desolation wreaked by Gog and Magog, but before the advent of Enoch and Elijah:\textsuperscript{4}

1. Judaei etiam tunc convertentur ad Dominum. "In diebus illis salvabitur Juda, et Israel habitabit confidenter." (Jer. 23,16)
4. Hugo Ripelin de Argentina, O.P. (1210-1270), Compendium theologicae veritatis:

Liber Septimus
De adventu antichristi, Cap. vi.

1 [recto, 34] Antequam veniet dominus ad iudicium regni romani fiet defectio. Nam sicut dicit glossa super apocalipsim: Prius erit discessio ab utroque imperio, qua impleta aderit antichristus. Hic ex parentem seminis-

5 concipietur. Sed post conceptum descendet spiritus malignus in uterum matris cuius virtute operatione deinceps puer nascetur et aletur ac adolescet propter filius predicationis [sic] [verso, 1] dicitur. Nascetur autem in babilonia de tribu dan, sicut dicit glossa super apocalipsim.10 Post hoc veniet in hierusalem et circumcidet se dicens iudeis se esse christum illis promissum. Unde plebs iudaica special iter adherebit illi, sicut dicit Haymo super Apocalipsim.11 Donec Helia [5]

---

1. Formerly, the Compendium was attributed to Albertus Magnus. Ulm: Johannes Zainer, 1481 (Hain 437); University of Arizona Special Collections BX 1749 H8. The passages reproduced here are from book 7. See Appendix B, no. 18, for the passage concerning Gog and Magog/the Ten Tribes.

10. The Glossa ordinaria reprinted in the PL (CXIV) does not mention the idea that the Beast (=Antichrist) would be born in Babylon of the tribe of Dan, an idea that seems to have originated in the Latin Tiburtine Sibyl. Rather, under Rev. 13,1 the Glossa notes in a spiritualizing tone that betrays its distance from the concrete, personalizing thought common to much apocalyptic: "'Et vidi,' etc. Bestia spiritualiter est Antichristus, vel generaliter tota collectio malorum." (733b).

11. Haymo of Auxerre (see ch. V. note 21) does not say this precisely, but, concerning the catalogue of Jacob's sons (from Genesis 46 and 49) in Rev. 7: "Hoc etiam non est prætereadum cur Dan de hoc catalogo fuerit ejectus, cum in caeteris libris sicut et caeteri fratres inveniatur. Manasses enim qui non fuit filius Jacob, sed qui alienigena matre natus est, id est, de Aseneth fillia Putipharis sacerdotis Heliopolis [sic], locum eius teneat. Ad quod dicendum, quod de Dan nasciturus est Antichristus, juxta illud Jacob, 'Fiat Dan coluber in via,' etc., usque 'cadat ascensor eius retro' (Gen. 49). Ejicitur itaque ex hoc loco Dan, ut ostendatur Antichristus ex numero sanctorum ejiciendus. Aliter: Dan et Enoch predicantibus qui ex illis salvandi fuerint ad christum revertantur. Angelus bonus primo deputabitur ad custodiam antichristo, sed quando ita obstinabitur in peccato quod dictet se esse deum, et extollit se supra omne quod dicitur deus aut colitur, nec sicut dicit apostolus. Tunc primo deseret eum angelus ex toto [10]

nec habebit eum postea ad promotionem, sed ad accusationem.

De mala vita antichristi, Cap. vii

Antichristus erit luxuriosus et in concupiscenciis feminarum et dicit Daniel 11[,17]. In aperto tamen per ypocrisim simulabit sanctitatem ut facilius decipere possit. Cor autem suum per superbiam magnificabit. Et sicut Daniel 8[,25]: Contra [15] principem principum consurget, id est, contra deum, ut dicit glossa super Danielem 7. In tantam elevabitur superbiam, ut leges et interpretatur iudicium transiens Hebraeorum; qui scilicet, postquam veritas apparuit, omnia illorum sacrificialia et victima transierunt..." Expositio in Apocalypsin, in: PL, CXVII.1037d - 1038a. Concerning the advent of the Beast (later interpreted as the Antichrist) in Rev. 13, Haymo writes:

′Et vidi de mari.′ Hoc est de multitudine reproborum, vel de profunda perfidia Judaeorum. ′Bestiam ascendentem.′ Id est Antichristus. [...]

Hic itaque, sicut dixi, bestia quae ascendit de mari, diabolum significat, qui ascendit de cordibus reproborum, ut amplius saeviat, solutus per ipsum perditum hominem, qui nascetur de plebe Judaica, juxta illud:

′Fiat Dan coluber in via,′ ey usque ′Ut cadat ascensor eius retro′ (Gen. 49)." (PL CXVII.1092d) Haymo repeats and amplifies his earlier point that the Antichrist will come from the Jewish people, but has added the idea that the Jews will be especially attracted (more than other peoples) to the Antichrist -- an idea not clearly visible in Revelation.

Adso's Libellus explains this passage (from II. Thess. 2,3) as follows:

"Et extollitur, id est erigitur in superbiam, supra omne quod dicitur Deus, id est, supra omnes sanctos, qui secundum Psalmistam dixi dicuntur: Ego dixi, dixi estis (Ps. 32,6). Vel supra omnes deos gentium, Herculem videlicet, Apollinem, Jovem, Mercurium, quos pagani deos esse existimant. Super omnes istos deos exolletur Antichristus, qui majorem et fortiorum se omnibus faciet: en non solum super hos, sed etiam supra omne quod colitur, id est, supra sanctam Trinitatem, qua sola colenda et adoranda est, ut Creator ab omni creatura sua." PL CT.1295c.

De sequacibus antichristi, Cap. ix.

For comparison, these passages are from the undated Ulm printing (before 1473):\textsuperscript{15}

fol. 119\textsuperscript{r} (Ch. 6)

\textsuperscript{13} Daniel 7,24-25.

\textsuperscript{14} Actually Daniel 7,24-25. The Vulgate reads "et alius consurget post eos et ipse potentior erit prioribus et tres reges humiliabit et sermones contra Excelsum loquetur et sanctos Altissimi conteret et putabit quod possit mutare tempora et leges."

\textsuperscript{15} The volume in which this work is bound, Wolfenbüttel Li 4° 2, dates from 1473 (Hain 435).

fol. 120' (ch. 9)

fol. 120'' (ch. 13)

1 [26] Iudei vero tunc¹⁶ convertentur ad fidem et sancta ecclesia usque in finem mundi pacifica conquiescet, quia ex tunc fraudulentia et s[a]evicia diaboli penitus deficiet.

¹⁶. That is, after the death of the Antichrist.
Nikolaus von Dinkelsbühl (+1433), ‘Tractatus octo’ on the 3rd Commandment:

On this topic, Augustine speaks against Faustus, saying: "If you ask why Christians do not rest on Saturday, I will answer that it is because it used to be a sign, but it has now been fulfilled by Christ." The second reason is that it was changed so that no-one would ever again think that we are still obliged to rest on Saturday on account of the commandment of the Old Testament. He who Judaizes sins gravely.

But these I say are the preachers of Antichrist. When he comes, he will order all to rest on Saturday and not Sunday, for he will pretend that he will die and rise again from death, and so he will force Christendom to Judaize, and he will draw them to himself, as he wants them to rest Saturday.

I.e., those who claim Christians ought to rest and celebrate on Saturday.

³. Family I, "Do got in siner magenkraft"; (Tübingen, 1870), II, 487-488.

². In the Vulgate, filius perditionis (II. Thess. 2,3): the son of perdition.
Translation:

[1] Daniel prophecies, saying: the Antichrist comes from 'tribu' [the tribe of Dan] in Babylon and is born from the most wicked man and woman and when he is conceived the evil spirit [Satan] will enter [the womb] with him and will be born and raised with him. He will be called a Son of Death [5] and the whole world will believe in him and he will have great skill and work false miracles and find all hidden treasures. He will call himself God and circumcize himself and call himself the Messiah and rebuild Salomon's temple and place his throne therein and all the Jews will hasten to him. He will pervert [10] humankind by horrific and frightful signs, large amounts of gold, silver and gifts, and by means of other signs, and he will kill all Christian people as well as Elias and Enoch, who will be revived on the third day. He will send his twelve messengers [15] and seventy-two disciples out into all lands to preach, and he will preach four-and-a-half years, and order, in the middle of the Temple, that he be worshipped as God, and he will draw the Jews to himself, saying he is the Messiah, and he will follow Christ's footsteps, saying he wants to ascend to Heaven from the Mount of Olives. [The Antichrist is then killed by heavenly power and the Last Days take their appointed course.]

---

3. Have himself circumcized.

4. Or convert, draw to himself.

5. Apostles.

[fol. 145', col. 2]

[The Antichrist is born of the tribe of Dan, etc., and grows up evil.]

16 ...Cum ergo venerit iste impius antichristus filii israel qui ab alexandro intra montes Caspios in plaga septentrionali super occi-anum [oceanum], ubi nunc est finis imperii magni Canis inter duo castra d[i]c[t]a guth7 et maguth8 futu-runt inclusi, ut refert magister hystoriarum9 et se-cundum Iosephum facto terre motu in conspectu principis, montibus cadentibus super montes ibi-dem partim montibus partim muro indissolu-bili et portis ferreis obserati, qui adhuc ibi dicuntur esse incantati nudi incedentes carni-bus crudis et arborum fructibus vivunt et in maximo numero consistunt, intantum ut secundum aliqus possent xxiii regna implere, qui etiam qua-dam celesti virtute et moncium portarum et muro-rum firmitate et imperatoris de cathayo scilicet magni Canis, velut regine Amasonum mi-licia obserati, exire nequeunt, excepto dum-taxat qu(ando) pro monstro ipse magnus Canis al-i-quos de eis qu[a]n[do]que portis apertis extrahit et mirabili gratia in exercitu suo secum ponit. Isti predicto antichristo adiungentur virtute quorum re-gnabit et erit monarca potentissimus. Et con-gregatis aliiis iudeis qui sunt per orbem disper-si, veniens iherosolimam circumcidet se, dicens iu-deis se esse christum, ipsis in lege promissum, christum vero nostrum fuisse deceptorem et magum. Omnes itaque iudei accedentes et ei adherentes con-fluent ad ipsum, quia ipsi nimio desiderio fer-vent de adventu messie, per quem expectant a captivitate liberari, decepti signis, et alecti promissis. Et quia videbunt eum omni prosperitate et gloria clarescere, regesque subjugare, ideo illi longo excecati errore, eum tamquam verum messiam Septimus punctus est scire quomodo iudei cognoscent se deceptos per antichristum et quomodo convertentur finaliter ad fidem catholicam. Notandum ergo quod postquam iudei re-ceperunt antichristum tamquam messiam suum, decepti ex hiis qui dicta sunt in precedenti puncto. Tunc mit-tet deus ad eorum et aliorum multorum conversionem Helyam et Enoch ...

[The prophets preach, are martyred, then resurrected, and the Antichrist is killed on the Mount of Olives. The author adduces numerous 'proof-texts' from the Hebrew and Christian Bibles that are supposed to foretell the final conversion of the Jews (a small number of them, at least) to Christianity.]
8. Compendium de vita antichristi:

1 Quinto circa processum antichristi nota quatuor:
Quarto nota in qua etate incipient hec omnia quae ecclesiastici iiii dicitur: "Vidi coniunctos [sic] viventes qui ambulant sub sole cum adolescentc secundo..."32 id est anti-[5]christo. nam primus adolescens salutis fuit christus. Circa cultum eius nota iiii per quam attrahet ad se diversos cultus. Primo enim ut attrahet ad se Iudeos dicet se messiam promissum in lege verum deum et verum hominem et reedificabit templum salo. [Salomonis] (II Thess. 2).

---

1. Anon., printed in 1475. Bound together with Jean Gerson, 'Disputatio inter clericum et militem super potestatem prelatis ecclesie atque principibus terrarum commissa sub forma dyalogi'. The passage cited here is from the fifth point, note 4.

2. Vulgate, Ecc. 4,15: "vidi cunctos viventes qui ambulant sub sole cum adolescentc secundo qui consurgit pro eo.". Biblia Sacra, 990.

[The Sibyl appears in the first act and is received by the 'prince', the Duke of Burgundy, son of Kaiser Maximilian. She is asked to explain why she has come.]

[171]

SIBILLA DICIT:

9 Genediger herr, ich han vernumen,
Wie das etlich judisch rabi
Durch all gegent verkunden, wi
Ir messias vorhanden sei,
Und melden auch vorauß dabei wie er alle ionigkreich nem ein,
Darzu alle furstenthum gemein,
Laß auch nit hin all geistlich stent.
Nu hab ich am gestirn erkent,
Wie wol die zeit allein waiß got,
Das es doch nirgend stat noch hot,
Des ich mecht vil gezeuknus han.
Die ich umb kurz willen fur laß gan.
Darumb so keren die rabi zu uns herein,
So mach ich ir lug offechnlich schein,
Wann nach meiner waren proficei
Nehen sie sich gar vast herbei.

HIE GET DER MESSIAS MIT DREIEN RABI UND EINEM SCHALLAT JUDEN, DER SPRICHT:

Weicht auß, tret umbe und ruckt von stat!
Ir habt lang genug innen gehabt
Gewalt, herschaft und regimient,
Das nu alles wurd sein end.
Wir haben doch so lang geharrt,
Piß sich begeben hat ein fart,
Das wir aucg kumen sein zum pret,
Das ir zwar nit noch gedacht het.

[172]

EIN RABI:

1 Ir Cristen, do tret an ein ort,
Weicht in die winkel da und dort
Und laßt uns auch herschen ein weil,
Wann er ist nit von hinn ein meil,

Hie stet er, der fort wirt regiren,
Daran in niemant mer mag geirren.
Ir habt gemutwilt lange zeit,
Dann ruckt zusammen und macht weit!

10  DER NARR:
Ei hat dich der teufel herein getragen?
Wolst du uns all in die winkel jagen?
Ich wolt dich ee selber arsposen,
Ein har nit in deiner schwarten loßen.

15  MARSCHALK:
Was sagst du, Jud, dann darzu?

19  DER ANDER RABI:
Merk eben, was ich darzu thu!
Ich kund euch hie Messiam, wist,
Der uns lange zeit verkundt ist,
Und wirt die judischeit erheben.

20  DER NARR:
Ich torst dir wol eins auf das maul geben,
Du schwarzer hunt! Was meinst du damit?
Ge dannen, das ich dich schut der rit!

25  DER DRITT RABI:
Was durft ir des narren spil?
Hie ist Messias schlecht und wil,
Das ir im all gelobt und schwert.

30  DER NARR:
Ach das man die dein maul nit pert
Mit einem zellen auß einem prifet
Und dich nit drus und peulen anget!

34  HOFMEISTER DICIT ZU DEM RABI:
Sag auch dein meinung, mach ein ent!

38  DER NARR:
Ja ee man mit dir in mist rennt.

43  DER VIERT RABI FELLT DEM MESSIAS ZU FUSZ UND SPRICHT:
O heiliger, unser hail und trost,
Durch den all Juden sein erlost,
Laßt paId ein zeichen werden schein!

48  DER NARR:
Es wil sust ganz nicht mit uns sein
Und macht dem volk ein wenig vorcht,
Sust wirt nichts gutß an uns gerucht.
HIE GET EIN TRACH UND SPEIT FEUR AUSZ. DER NARR SPRICHT:
Fox grit, was teufels pist dan du?

15 Seh einer dem schnoden merwolf zu!

SIBILLA SPRICHT:
Ich peut die, trach, bei Jesus craft,
Das du von dir nit hie werd geschaft,
Dann das du sitlich weichest ab,

20 Piß ich hie klar geoffent hab,
Was disse zauberei bedeute,
Darmit ir Juden dann ander leut
Und euch selber so grob anligt
Und mit dem falschen Endecrist triegt.

25 Dan eins bescheid mich, ob duß pist,
Sag, warumb heist du der Entcrist?

ENDCRIST:
Secht, das ist schlecht davon der sin,
Das ich ein ent der Cristen bin.

[...]

[179]

SIBILLA:
Falscher Messias, so ste auf palt,
Erzel hie vor ganzer gemein,
Was dein anschleg gewesen sein,
Groß schalkheit und auch zaubrei,

20 Das all Cristen versten dabei
Eur falsch anschleg und eur posheit,
Des gib hie folligen bescheit.

ENDCRIST DICIT:
O genediger furst und werde frau,
Ir zwinget mich so hart und gnau
Mit eurem cristenlichem gewalt,
Das ich nichts heimlich dahinden behalt,
Sunder das ist die grost ursach,
Wir han nu talast ungemach

30 Gehabd wol xiiiि.с jar,
Und in solicher zeit furwar
Gar vil geliden von den Cristen.

[180]

Ja wann sie dennoch dabei wisten,
Was großer fluch, was haß und neit
Wir in stet han getragen seit,
Wie vil groß guts in abgeraubt,

5 Wie vil an irem leben getaubt,
Der erzet wir gewesen sein,
Wie vil der jungen kindelein
In angestolen und getot
Und mit irem keuschem plut gerot
10 Und die euch Cristen abgefurt
Zu smach der jerlichen gepurt
Jesu, die ir ewig beget,
Des haß und neid uns so bestet,
Das es all unser freud vertreibt
15 Und Messias so lang außen bleibt
Und in kein weg uns trostet nicht;
Deshalb hab wir diß zugericht,
Meinten als volk gereizet han,
Uns ganz zu werden untarten.
20 Das hat uns vil zu schir gefelt,
Bleibt furpas mer wol ab gestelt,
Fiß das er selber kumpt ein mal;
Dann wer uns iez dieser unfal
Allein darzu geschlagen nicht,
25 So hetten wir zuversicht,
Die ganz judischeit must sein verdorben
Oder all Cristen darumb gestorben.
Translation:

[171]
[9] SIBILLA SAYS:
[10] Your Grace, I have heard
That many Jewish Rabbis
Are telling in all regions
That their Messiah has arrived,
And are prophesying
[15] That he will conquer all kingdoms
And all principalities,
And will not leave out the clerical estate.
Now I have seen in the stars,
Although God alone knows the precise time,
[20] That there is nowhere any sign of such a thing,
Of which I have much proof,
Which I will leave out for brevity's sake.
The Rabbis are headed here now to announce this,
And I will make their lie apparent to all.
[25] For according to my authentic prophecy,
They are approaching right now.

THE MESSIAH ENTERS WITH THREE RABBIS AND A PEDDLAR JEW, WHO SAYS:
Move over, step aside and get out the way!
You have been in charge long enough
[30] Of power, lordship and government;
Now that has all come to an end.
We have waited so long
For this campaign to start
That we have now come to the hour of reckoning," [35] Which has not yet even occurred to you Christians.

[172]
[1] A RABBI:
You Christians, step aside
Press into the corners over there, and there,
And let us rule for a time,
[5] For he is not even a mile away,
Here he stands, he who will rule from now on,
No-one can stop him now.
You have ruled the roost for a long time,
Now push over and make room!

[10] THE FOOL:

"This is what is intended by the expression ‘arrived at the counting-table’.
Hey, did the Devil himself drag you in? You want to drive us all into the corners? I'll kick your arse first And tear out every hair of your beard.

THE SECOND RABBI: Just watch what I do! I announce to you the Messiah, Who, as you know, has been promised to us for ages past, And who will rouse all Jewry.

[20] THE FOOL: I'll give you one in the teeth, You blackhearted dog! What do you mean by this? Get away! Let the shaking fever take you!

THE THIRD RABBI: What profits you this fool's play? Here is the Messiah, easy as that, Waiting for you to take your oath to him.

[25] THE FOOL: You should be whacked in the mouth with a stick taken from a cess-pool. A plague of boils on you!

MAJOR-DOMO TO THE RABBI: Say your piece, and make it fast!

THE FOOL: Before we pitch you onto the dung-heap.

THE FOURTH RABBI FALLS TO THE FEET OF THE MESSIAH AND SAYS: O Holy One, our salvation and our hope, Through whom all the Jews are saved, Quick, cause a wondrous sign to appear! Otherwise we will not be left whole, Scare these people a bit, Or we will not be treated kindly.

HERE A DRAGON APPEARS SPITTING FIRE. THE FOOL SAYS: Odds boils, what demon's brood are you? Just look at this shabby werewolf!

THE SIBYL SAYS:
Listen, dragon, I'm telling you by the power of Jesus
You can do nothing here,
Except to stand back politely
Until I have clearly revealed
What this magic trick means,
With which you Jews so stupidly attempt to fool other people and yourselves,
And to deceive with your false Antichrist.

Then tell me one thing, if you are he;
Why are you called the Antichrist?

ANTICHRIST:
Well, this is the reason, quite simply;
I shall put an end to the Christians [End-Christ].

[The Sibyl routs the dragon; finally, the 'false
Messiah'/Antichrist drinks a curse on the Christians.
After he drinks, he stands straight up, faints and falls down. The 'false Messiah' turns out to be powerless.]

SIBYL:
False Messiah, stand up now,
Tell everyone assembled here
What your plan was,
Your great slyness and your magical art
So that all Christians will understand
Your false pretensions and your wickedness,
Tell us the whole truth now.

THE ANTICHRIST SAYS:
O merciful prince and worthy lady,
You press me so hard and precisely
With your Christian might,
That I can keep nothing hidden.
This is the main reason:
We have been in misery now
For fourteen hundred years
And in that time
Suffered a great deal at the hands of Christians.

And yet if only they knew
What great curses, what hatred and envy
We have always harbored for them,
How much we have stolen from them,
How many whose lives we have spoiled
Of those to whom we were physicians;
How many young children
We have stolen from them and killed
And stained red with their innocent blood

[10] As well as we stole from you Christians
To dishonor the yearly birth
Of Jesus, which you always celebrate,
Whose hatred and envy is with us so constantly
That it drives away all our pleasures

[15] And the Messiah is so long in coming
And does nothing to comfort us,
This is why we did this to you,
Thinking to trick all peoples
Into subjecting themselves to us.

[20] We would have liked that a great deal,
But that will have to wait Until he himself comes;
Then this disaster would not Have happened to us,

[25] And we would be confident
That all Jewry must be destroyed
Or all Christians would die.

[The Jews are tried and condemned to a variety of unspeakably foul and humiliating tortures]
10. Pamphilius Gengenbach (ca.1480-1524/25), Der Nollhart:

fol. g iii'

1 Der Jud fragt den Bruder
So du so ein güter wysag bist
Sag mir wenn kumpt der Endtchrist/
Oder wann sol er werden gboren
5 Ich halt dich sunst für einen thoren.
Wann wir sein gwartet hand biß har
Jetz me dann fünfzhentundert jar
Sibenzehen und ettlich tag/
Ich fleißlich bit das selb mir sag.
Der brüder:
Du verfluchter Jud ich dir das sag
Es lyt auch clerlich an dem tag
Jacob hat es wol ußgeleit
Do er unß von der schlangen seit
15 Der Endtchrist wirt ein ursprung han Von eim geschlecht das heisset Dan

fol. g iii''

1 Von dem Judas auch was geboren
Der doch ewiglich ist verloren.
Der Jud:
Nun saltu weiter bscheiden meich
5 Wo er wirt uffenthalten seich/
In welcher stat er gboren werd wie lang er och regier uff erd
Und wann die waßt Auch werd zergon
Das soltu mich hie wissen lon/
Der Brüder:
Er wirt geboren hie vernim
In eir [einer] stat heißt Chorosaim/
Und yn Bethsaida erzogen
Vyl volck wirt dann von im betrogen/
15 In Capharanaum wirt er regieren•
Diß stet werden fast jubilieren/

•. Basel, 1517 (Wolfenbüttel 263 Quod.). A modern edition has been prepared by V. Uffer, Der Nollhart (Stuttgart/Bern, 1982; =Schweizer Texte, 1). See H. Rupprich, Die deutsche Literatur vom späten Mittelalter bis zum Barock Erster Teil (1371-1520), (Munich, 1970), 287.

•. Cf. the Revelations of Pseudo-Methodius.
Darumb sy gott verflu'chet hat/
Als imm Ewangelio gschiiben stat.
Ouch wirt er sich beschniden lan

20 Dry küng werden im hangen an Gog und Magog wirt ußgelossen
Die Alexander hat beschlossen
Die werden die Christen fast betrußben
Und ouch groß tru'bsal yn züfügen.

25 Es wirt ouch ein küngin von Mason [Amason]
Mit vyl der iuden zú im kom
Meinendt ir messias sy uff erden
Gar fast sie sich dann froßen werden.
Vyl zeichen wirt er thün die zyt

30 Do mit er dann betrügt die lüt.

Der Jud
O brüder dyse red laß ston
Ich wolt das er solt morgen kon Dann wir sein wol so lang hand gwart

fol. g iv'

1 Wann wir gepinget sind so hart
Von christen jest an allen enden
Wann unß dann got wurd disen senden
Woltns wirs [sic] in gar wol gedencken

5 Ouch yn zwyfach wyder intreken

Der brüder
O wie ein schno'der jud du bist/
Weist nit das er lengst kommen ist
Gab Jacob dir nit zu verston

10 Von Juda wurd nit der za'pter gnnon [genommen]
Es ka'm dann der / der zsenden ist
Lu'g ob das nit sy Jesu crist
So bald der selb uff erd ist kummen
So ward der za'pter von euch gnumen/

15 Das do gschach durch das Ro'misch reich
Also sind ir gantz ellendtgleich
Inn all diß wa'lt worden zerstro'wt
Christus hats euch ochlorlich qseit
Do er bitterlich gweinet hat

20 Über Jherusalem die stat.
Ho'rt wie es dem Endtcrist wirt gon was jm got geben wirt zu lon
So er hat nun vyl boßheit triiben
Und sich den waren got geschiiben

25 Vyl fürstten herren an sich bracht
So wil er dann uß teüfels macht
Gen hymmel faren christo gleich
Der senden wirt auß sinem reich
Den ertzengel sant Michael Der yn mit iomer und auch gvel
wirt nider slagen zu der erden
So wirst du jud betrogen werden!
The Jew asks the friar
Since you are such a good diviner,
Tell me when the Antichrist will come,
Or when he will be born.

Otherwise I will know you are a fool.
We have waited for him now
More than fifteen hundred years
And seventeen, and many days besides:
I beg of you, answer my question.

The Friar:
You damnable Jew, I will tell you;
It is quite obvious, and Jacob made it very clear
Where he tells us of the serpent.

The Antichrist will be descended
From the tribe of Dan

From which Judas also was born,
Who is forever damned and lost.

Now tell me further Where he will abide
In which city he will be born
And how long he will reign on earth
And when the world will pass away
Tell me these things here and now.

Listen then! He will be born
In a city called Chorosaim [Khorasan]
And brought up in Bethsaida.
Many people will then be deceived by him,
And he will rule in Capharnaum.
These cites will rejoice greatly
For which God has cursed them,
As the Gospel says.
He will also have himself circumcized
And three kings will follow him.
Gog and Magog, whom Alexander enclosed.

Genesis 49,17: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path."
Will be let loose:
They will cause great misery in Christendom
And create much pain and suffering.

[25] And the Queen of the Amazons will also
Come to him with many Jews
Who think their Messiah is on earth:
They will be delighted indeed.
At this time he will work many signs [wonders]

[30] With which he will deceive people.
The Jew:
O friar, say no more;
I wish he would come tomorrow
Because we have been waiting for him for so long

[fol. g iv']

[1] And because we are pressed so hard
By Christians everywhere and always.
If God were to send him to us,
We would be very grateful

[5] And doubly return [his investment in us? -- unclear]
The Friar:
O, what a vile Jew you are!
Don’t you know that he came long ago?
Didn’t Jacob make it clear

[10] That the scepter would not depart from Judah
Until he came who is to be sent?
You lie if you say this is not Jesus Christ.
As soon as he came to earth,
The scepter was taken from you.

[15] This was done by the Roman Empire.
Therefore you were scattered
In great misery all over the world.
Christ also spoke clearly to you
When he wept bitter tears

Now hear how the Antichrist will fare,
And how God will reward him:
After he has done much evil,
And declared himself the True God,

[25] When he has won over many princes and lords,
He will desire, by demonic powers,
To ascend to Heaven just as Christ did.
Christ will send from his kingdom
The Archangel Saint Michael

---

Who will strike down the Antichrist,
Casting him deep into misery and disgrace.
And this is how you will be deceived, Jew!

[Enoch and Elijah are resurrected, preach to the whole world, convert the nations, and the Last Judgment takes place.]
APPENDIX D: ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Ebstorf World Map (1235): Gog and Magog eating human flesh and drinking human blood, as specified by the caption.

2. Sächsische Weltchronik (Saxon Chronicle, c. 1320); the 'enclosed Jews':

als nun der vater das vorhenge des tempelcs over-luimert vor sytte vi ocen mit he.

Es hadt he ho

ung gewesen twelf iar de-

vule he de saur behuand-

Alexander to he veit van der

ers hadde geder sye vor och war intime dohe-an die ge-burgs dat dar het monds af

py dar vaut he nie rich

dechter-gemagen vor der dochter wie ven und vor die

dochter-wunen von ven

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

dochter-von die wunen vor die

3. Historiated Bible I. 15th century manuscript; the 'enclosed Jews', depicted with red hair and beards (Alexander’s beard is blonde here and throughout)
a) Alexander prays, kneeling, asking God to enclose Gog and Magog in the Caspian Mountains. Gog and Magog are the two demonic kings at the top; the armed hordes inside the mountains are their people.
b) Gog and Magog break out of the Caspian Mountains at the end of time.
5. Der Antichrist (Strasbourg, 1480):

a) An apostle of the Antichrist preaches to the Red Jews and the Queen of the Amazons.

Der einander des Ennokrist pot pædiget der kunigin von Amazon und den roten juden, die der gros allerander in den getrijge Caspie beschlossen het. Und die selben juden kumen uß zu des Ennokrist spen/als sanctus Jeromimus beschribet.
b) The Red Jews and the Queen of the Amazons march to Jerusalem.

REFERENCES

Abbreviations:

BLVS = Bibliothek des Literarischen [Litterarischen] Vereins zu Stuttgart. Stuttgart, 1843-

CChr = Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina. Turnhout: Brepols, 1954-

CChrCM = Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina. Continuatio Medievalis. Turnhout: Brepols, 1971-

MGH = Monumenta Germaniae Historica. 1826-

PL = Patrologia Latina, ed. J.-P. Migne. Paris, 1844-

Wolfenbüttel = Herzog August Bibliothek

1) Primary Sources

Adso of Montier-en-Der. Libellus de Antichristo ad Gerbergam Reginam. PL CI (in second volume of Alcuin’s works); "Epistola Adsonis ad Gertergam reginam de ortu et tempore Antichristi", in: Ernst Sackur, ed., Sibyllinische Texte und Forschungen, 97-113; and Adso Dervensis: De Ortu et Tempore Antichristi, D. Verhelst, ed., CChrCM XLV.

Ambrose, De Fide ad Gratianum. PL XVI.

Augustine, De Civitate Dei libri XXII. CChr XLVII-XLVIII; PL XLI.

Commodianus. Commodiani Carmina, ed. Joseph Martin. CChr CXXVIII.

Compendium de vita antichristi. Anonymous, 1475.

1857 (=BLVS, 215); also published in the MGH. Scriptores qui vernacula lingua usi sunt. Deutsche Chroniken, II, ed. Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde. Hannover, 1980 [1877]. Also known as the Sächsische Weltchronik.

Ettmüller, Ludwig (ed.). Die beiden ältesten deutschen Jahrbücher der Stadt Zürich. Zürich, 1844 (=Mittheilungen der Antiquarischen Gesellschaft in Zürich, 2); containing Gerhard Sprenger's fifteenth-century compilation of the Zurich Jahrbücher, 35-96.

*Glossa ordinaria. PL CXIV."

Helm, Karl (ed.). Das Buch der Maccabäer in mitteldeutscher Bearbeitung. Tübingen, 1904 (=BLVS, 233).

Historia von der Geburt // Leben/Sitten/Kühnheit/Tu- // genden ... Alexanders (des Groß genannt) Königs in Macedonien. Frankfurt am Main, 1573 (Wolfenbüttel T 465.8° Helmst.).

Honorius Augustodunensis. De imagine mundi libri tres. PL CLXXII.

Hugo a Novo Castro [Hugh of Newcastle]. Tractatus de victoria Christi contra Antichristum. Nuremberg, 1471 (Wolfenbüttel Li 4° 191).

Hugo Ripelin de Argentina [Hugh of Strasbourg], Compendium Theologicae Veritatis. Ulm: Johannes Zainer, 1481; University of Arizona Special Collections BX 1749 H8.

widerkommen, das gelobte Land einnehmen, und das // Israelitische Königreich wider anrichten ko’n nen? ... Von // Einem Liebhaber der Wahrheit // hervor gegeben // Im
Jahr 1666 (Wolfenbüttel 317.63 Th. (13)).

Jerome, Commentaria in Hieremiam prophetam. CChr LXXIV; PL
XXIV.

Jerome, Commentariorum in Hieriechielem libri XIV. CChr LXXV;
PL XXV.

Jerome, Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim. CChr LXXII; PL
XXIII.

Jonas, Justus. Preface to Libellus Martini Lutheri, Christum Iesum, verum Iudaorum et semen esse Abrahae

Der Jüngere Titurel. 1477 (Wolfenbüttel 275.3 Hist. 2°).

Kautzsch, E. (trans. and ed.). Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des alten Testaments. 2 vols. Tübingen, 1900.

Kelchner, Ernst. Der Endkrist der Stadt-Bibliothek zu
Frankfurt am Main. Frankfurt, 1891.

Keller, Adalbert (ed.). Gesta Romanorum Das ist der Roemer Tat. Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1841 (=Bibliothek der gesammten deutschen National-Literatur, 22).

Halle/ Waisenhaus, 1884.

Koppitz, Alfred (ed.). Der Göttweiger Trojanerkrieg. Berlin, 1926 (=Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, 29).

Kromer (Kramer), Michael. Eyn Underredung vom // glawben, durch herr Michelin Kromer, // Pfarrherr zu Cunitz, und eynem Judischen Rabien, mit // namen Jacob vonn Brucks, geschehen ynß // Richters hauße do selost zu Cunitz. // Mitwoch nach Andree // M.D.xxiii. [Erfurt: Matthes Maler,
1 December, 1520], in: Otto Clemen, ed., Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation, I. Leipzig and New York: Rudolf Haupt, 1907, 423-444 [numbered incorrectly as 423-344].

Letzte (Tu’rcken) Posaum über Deutschland, Die in verdammliche Sicherheit versunkenen Welt vom Sünder-Schlaf auffzuwecken. Regensburg, 1664; reprinted 1683 (Wolfenbüttel Da 605 (25)).

Peter Comestor. Historia Scholastica. PL CXCVIII.

Rephun, Johan. Jüdischer Heerzug. Das ist: Einfältige
Ju'den-Predigt, Darinnen gehandelt wird, ob die zehen Stämme Israelis das gelobte Land wieder ko'nnen besitzen und behaupten. Bayreuth, 1666 (Wolfenbüttel 317.63. Th.).

Schwartz, Peter, OP. Der Stern Meschiach. Esslingen: Conrad Feyner [Feyner], 1477.

Thorowgood, Thomas. Jewes in America, or Probabilities that the Americans are of that Race. London, 1650.

--- Opus aureum ac novum et a doctibus viris diu expectatum. Cologne: Heinrich of Neuß (Henricus de Nuscia). February 1509.

--- De vita et moribus Iudeorum Victoris de Carben olim Judei nunc Christi miseratiane Christiani Libellus. Paris: H. Stephani, 1511 (Wolfenbüttel 151.51 Th.); partial reprint of his Opus aureum (q.v.).

*Von einer grosse meng / unnd gewalt der Juden die lange zeyt / mit unwonhaftigen Wüsten beschlossen und verborgen / gewesen,Jetzunder aufgebrochen und an tag kom= // men seyn/Dreyssig tagrayß von Jerusalem / sich hydergeschlagen, Was sy fur'genom= / men haben findet man nach laut dises / Sendbriefs zum sayl glaub= / liche

2) Secondary Scholarship

Baumann, Karin. Aberglaube für Laien. Zur Programmatik und

Epstein, Mark Alan. The Ottoman Jewish Communities and their Role in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. Freiburg, 1980 (=Islamkundliche Untersuchungen, 56).

Forrell, George W. "Luther and the War against the Turks", in: Church History XIV (1945), 256-271.

Grabmann, M. Die Geschichte der scholastischen Methode. Freiburg, 1911.

Guerchberg, Séraphine. "The Controversies over the Alleged

Jacobs, Friedrich and Ukert, J.H.A. "Xylographische Werke: Der

Lévi, Israel. "La légende d'Alexandre dans le Talmud et le Midrasch", in: Revue d'Études Juives 7 (1883), 78-93.

Lucken, Linus. Antichrist and the Prophets of Antichrist in the Chester Cycle. Washington: Catholic University Press, 1940.

--- The Formation of a Persecuting Society. Power and Neubauer, Adolf. "Where are the Ten Tribes?", in: The Jewish Quarterly Review I (1883), 14-28, 95-114, 185-201, 408-423.

--- Kleine Schriften zum Alexanderroman. Meisenheim am Glan, 1976.

Spalding, Keith. A Historical Dictionary of German Figurative Usage. Oxford, at the University Press, 1952-Stammler, Wolfgang, Ruh, Kurt, et al., Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters. Verfasserlexikon. 2nd ed. 1977–

Telle, Joachim. "Was ist ein 'roter Jude'? Bemerkungen zu einem pseudo-paracelsischen Arkantext bei Benedictus Figulus", in: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Pharmazie 28/1 (1976), 5-8.

Wichelshaus, J. "Das Exil der zehn Stämme Israels", in: Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft 5 (1851), 467-482

