

Preface

In the tradition of the Coyote Papers, Volume 6 contains a diverse range of contributions. Diana Archangeli, Jane Hill, and Susan Steele, all on the faculty at the University of Arizona, have written papers that variously focus on the core aspects of linguistics -- phonology, morphology, syntax, and semantics. Michael Flynn, who was visiting professor in 1985-86 and who is now on the faculty at Carleton College (Northfield MN 55057), has written on linguistics and psychological theory. And David Freeman, who earned his PhD here in 1986 and is now on the faculty at Fresno Pacific College (Fresno CA 93727), presents his doctoral research in applied linguistics.

It would have been impossible to publish these papers without a lot of help. I would like to thank Professors Diana Archangeli, Richard Oehrle, and Susan Steele for their various efforts. I would also like to thank my fellow students Kathy Budway and Megan Crowhurst for proofing; Ken Drozd for offering the use of his word processor; Mark Lewis and Ellen Livingston for handling the correspondence; and Gabriella Albanese and Robin Schafer for their general assistance. Lin Hall and Pauline Smalley deserve special thanks for their good-natured secretarial expertise. Finally, I would like to acknowledge the financial assistance once again provided by the Associated Students of the University of Arizona.

Paul Saka
Editor