

EDITORIAL FOREWORD

On behalf of all our members, I am proud to present the first issue of Volume 38 of the Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law. Our Journal developed this issue while working virtually due to COVID-19, with many of our members having to overcome personal and professional challenges in order to complete their work. Indeed, this issue is the product of countless hours of work in less-than-ideal circumstances, and so I would like to thank each and every member of our Journal who contributed to its completion.

This issue contains two articles and two student Notes. The first article explores how international law addresses the continuing globalization of business transactions and corporate governance, while the second article contends that the legitimacy of international courts and tribunals is and ought to be measured in terms of their ability to serve the public interest. Meanwhile, the two Notes are written by our Operations Editor, Matthew Nolte, and our Senior Articles Editor, Daniel Tilleman. Mr. Nolte's Note discusses the historically mammoth trade war between the United States and China and the political and legal consequences thereof, while Mr. Tilleman's piece uses Canada's medical marijuana law as a model that the United States can emulate.

Issue 38.1 is the second of three issues that the current Editorial Board will publish. Our current Board will also publish Issue 38.2 this spring. I look forward to the Journal's continued success and would like to thank you, dear subscriber, for your continued support of our endeavors. I hope that you thoroughly enjoy this issue and that you and your loved ones remain safe and healthy during this challenging time.
