

EDITORIAL FOREWORD

The Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law proudly presents the second issue of Volume 36. This issue is particularly special because it features the 18th annual review of World Trade Organization decisions. The WTO Case Review, which is an annual series on substantive international trade adjudications issued by the Appellate Body of the World Trade Organization, has become a part of AJICL's identity as an international journal. On behalf of the 2018-2019 Editorial Board, I would like to thank Professor Bhala and Professor Gantz, as well as Shannon B. Keating, and Eric Witmer for creating this instrumental piece which is essential to the Journal's international trade law scholarship.

In addition to the WTO Case Review, this issue also contains two thoroughly compelling articles. The first article authored by Michael Arthur Vacca, discusses the Toledo Guiding Principles and the interrelationship between education and religious freedom. The second article is a piece written by Daniel Altaras which discusses the legal framework of intermingling religion and state in Israel and argues that Israel should adopt a complete separation of religion and state while maintaining its unique Jewish character.

Lastly, the Journal features three student authors in this issue. Matthew Caylor, Managing Editor, compares the eminent domain systems of the United States, Germany, South Korea, and India. Aaron Green, Senior Articles Editor, compares the process of making immigration law in the United States, the United Kingdom, and France from a separation of powers perspective. Finally, Meighan LaFata, Operations Editor, explores informed consent in several jurisdictions, specifically in the United States, India, and Israel.

Volume 36.2, marks the third and final issue for AJICL's 2018-2019 Editorial Board. It has been an absolute honor to serve as Editor-in-Chief and I look forward to the 2019-2020 Editorial Board's continued dedication to the Journal's success.

Lynette Balderrama
Editor-in-Chief, 2018–2019

